This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

NYPL RESEARCH LIBRARIES
3 3433 07576983 0

HADDEUS OF WARSAW.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

BY MISS PORTER.

The time of life is short;
To spend that shortness basely, were too long;
If life did ride upon a dial's point,
Still ending at the arrival of an hour.

Shakspeare

VOL. I.

New York:
CHARLES WELLS.

1836.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
ASTOR LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
R 1918 L

THADDEUS OF WARSAW.

CHAPTER I.

The large and magnificent palace of Villanow, which stands on the northern banks of the Vistula, was the favourite residence of John Sobieski, king of Poland. That monarch, after having delivered his country from innumerable enemies, rescued Vienna, and subdued the Turks, used to retire to this place at certain seasons, and dispense those effects of his luminous and benevolent mind, which rendered his name great and his people happy.

When Charles the twelfth of Sweden visited the tomb of Sobieski, at Moscow, he exclaimed, "What a pity so great a man should ever die!" Ninety years after his death, the spirit of this great man appeared to revive in the person of his descendant, Constantine Count Sobieski, who in a comparatively private station, as palatine of Masovia, and the friend, rather than the lord, of his vassals, evinced by his actions, that he was the inheritor of his forefather's virtue, as well as of his blood.

He was the first Polish nobleman, who granted freedom to his peasants. He threw down their mud hovels, and built comfortable villages. He furnished them with seed, cattle, and implements of husbandry; then calling them all together, he laid before them the deed of their enfranchisement. Before he signed it, he expressed his fears to some of their old men, of the probability that they might abuse this new liberty, and become licentious.

"No," returned a grey-headed peasant, "when we held a firm grasp of no other property than the staffs which we have in our hands, we were destitute of all motive for a consistent conduct; and not having any thing to lose, acted on all occasions in an intemperate manner; but now that our houses and lands, and our cattle are absolutely our own, the fear of forfeiting them, will be a constant restraint upon our actions." The good sense and truth of this answer were manifested in the event. On their emancipation, they became so cheerful in their circumstances, and so correct in their behaviour, that the example of the Palatine was shortly followed by Zamoiski the great chancellor; prince Stanislaus, the king's nephew; and several of the principal nobility.

Thus, within the bosom of his family, did this illustrious man educate Thaddeus, the only male heir of his name, to the exercise of every peaceful virtue, until the beginning of the year 1792, when war began to threaten the tranquillity of a country which smiled with content and gratitude.

On the evening of an anniversary of the birth day of his grandson, the Palatine rode abroad with Zamoiski, and several others of a party, which had been celebrating the festival with its presence. The Countess and Thaddeus were left alone in the saloon. She sighed as she gazed on her son, who stood at some distance, fitting to his youthful thigh a variety of sabres, which his servant a little time before had laid upon the table. She observed with anxiety, the eagerness of his motion, his flushed cheek, and the ardor that was flashing from his eyes.

"Thaddeus," said she, "lay down that sword; I wish to speak with you." Thaddeus looked gaily up. "My Thaddeus," cried his mother, and the tears started to her eyes. The blush of enthusiasm faded from his face; he threw the sabre from him, and drew near the Countess.

"Why my dear mother do you distress yourself? when I am in battle, shall I not experience my grandfather's care; and be as much under the protection of God as at this moment.

"Yes, my child," answered she, wiping her wet cheek, "God will protect you. He is the protector of the orphan, and you are fatherless." The Countess paused, and the heart of Thaddeus drooped. "Here my son," said she, giving him a sealed packet, "take this: it will reveal to you who was your father. It is necessary that you should know the truth, and all the goodness of your grandfather." Thaddeus received it and stood silent with surprise. "Read it, my love," continued she, "but go to your own apartment; there you will be more retired."

Bewildered by the manner of the Countess, Thaddeus instantly obeyed. Shutting himself within his study, he impatiently opened the papers; and soon found his whole attention absorbed in the following recital:

"You are now, my Thaddeus! at the early age of eighteen, going to engage against the enemies of your country. Ere I resign my greatest comfort, to the casualties of war; ere I part with you, perhaps for ever, I would inform you who your father really was; that father, whose existence you have hardly known, and whose name you have never heard. You consider yourself an orphan; your mother a widow; but, alas I have now to tell you, that you are fatherless by the cruelty of man, not by the dispensation of heaven.

"Twenty years ago I accompanied my father in a tour through Germany into Italy. Grief for the death of my mother, had impaired his health, and the physicians ordered him to reside in a warmer climate; accordingly we fixed ourselves near the Arno. During several visits to Florence, my father met, in that city, with a young Englishman of the name of Sackville. These frequent meetings opened into intimacy, and he was invited to our house.

"Mr. Sackville was not only the handsomest man that I had ever beheld, but he seemed the most elegant in manners, the most noble in principle, and the most frank of heart. He was the first man for whose society I had found so lively a preference. I used to smile at this delight which I felt, or sometimes weep, for the emotions that agitated me were undefinable; but they were enchanting, and unheedingly I gave them indulgence. The hours of reciprocal sentiments and feelings which we passed together, the kind beaming of his looks, the thousand sighs that he breathed, the half-uttered sentences, all conspired to lead me into confidence.

"Thus were eight months spent. For the last three, doubts and anguish had usurped the fairy reveries of an infant tenderness. An averted glance, a cold answer, or careless demeanour, would now plunge me into all the horrors of distrust. The attention of Mr. Sackville died away. From being the constant object of his search, he now sedulously sought to avoid me. When my father withdrew to his closet he would take his leave and allow me to walk alone. Solitary and wretched were my rambles. Immured as I had been within the palace of Villanow, watching the declining health of my mother, I had learnt nothing of the real world; the little that I knew of society, being drawn from books, uncorrected by experience, taught me to believe a perfection in man, which, to my affliction, I have since found to be a poet's dream. When I came to Italy, I still continued averse to public company. In this seclusion the presence of Sackville being almost my only pleasure, entirely chased from my mind its usual reserve, and gradually and surely, won upon the awakened affections of my heart. Artless and unwarned, I knew not the nature of the feelings I cherished, until they had gained an ascendency that menaced my life.

"On the evening of one of those days in which I had not seen this too dearly beloved friend, I strolled out, and hardly conscious of my actions, threw myself along the summit of a flight of steps that led down to the Arno. My head rested against the base of a statue, which because of its fancied resemblance to me, Sackville had presented to my father. Every recollected kindness of his, now gave me additional torment; and clinging to its pedestal, as to the altar of my adoration, in the bitterness of disappointment, I addressed myself to the insensible stone; "O! were I as pale as thou art, and this breast as cold and still, would Sackville, when he looked on me, give one sigh to the creature he has destroyed?" My sobs followed this adjuration, and the next moment, I felt myself encircled in his arms. I struggled, and almost fainting, begged to be released. He did release me, and falling on his knees, implored my pardon for the misery I had endured. "Now Therese," cried he, "all is as it ought to be! you are my only hope. Consent to be mine else I shall be driven to madness!" His voice was hurried and incoherent. Lifting my eyes to his, I beheld them wild and bloodshot. Terrified at his look, and overcome by my own emotions, my head sunk back on the marble. With increased violence, he exclaimed, "have I deceived myself here too? Therese, did you not prefer me! Did you not love me?—Speak now I conjure you by your own happiness and mine. Do you reject me?" He clenched my hands in his with a force that made me tremble, and I hardly articulated, "I will be yours." At these words he hurried me down a dark vista, which led out of the gardens to the open country. A carriage stood at the gate. I fearfully asked what he intended. "You have given yourself to me," cried he, "and by the great Lord of heaven, no power shall separate us until you are mine out of the reach of man!" Unnerved in body, and weak in mind, I yielded to his impetuosity; and, suffering him to lift me into the chariot was carried to the door of the nearest monastery, where, in a few minutes we were married.

"I am thus particular in the relation of every incident, in the hope that you will, my dear son, see some excuse for my great imprudence in the circumstance of my youth, and the influence which a man who seemed all excellence, held over every thought of my heart. However my fault was not long unpunished,

"The ceremony past, my husband conductod me in silence back to the carriage. My full bosom discharged itself in abundance of tears, whilst Sackville sat by me unmoved and mute. Two or three times I raised my eyes in hopes of seeing in his some consolation for my hasty acquiescence. But no; his gaze, vacant and glaring, was fixed on the window; and his brow scowled as if he had been forced into an alliance with one whom he hated, rather than had just made a voluntary engagement with the woman he loved. My heart sickened at this commencement of a contract which I had dared to make, unsanctioned by my father's consent. At length, my sighs seemed to startle my husband's ear; and turning suddenly round. "Therese," cried he, "this marriage must not be told to the Count." "Why?" murmured I, hardly able to speak; "Because I have been precipitate. It would ruin me with my own family. Wait for only one month; and then I will publicly acknowledge you." The agitation of his features, the sternness of his voice, and the feverish burning of his hand, which held mine, alarmed me; and trembling from head to foot, I answered, "Sackville! I have already erred enough in consenting to this stolen union. I will not transgress further by concealing it. I will instantly throw myself at my father's feet, and confess all." His countenance darkened. "Therese," said he, "I have not married you to be your slave. I am your husband. You have sworn to obey me, and I command your silence. Till I allow you, divulge this marriage at your peril." This last cruel sentence, and the more cruel look that accompanied it, pierced me to the heart, and I fell senseless on the seat.

"When I recovered I found myself at the foot of that statue, beneath which my unfortunate destiny had been fixed. My husband was leaning over me. He raised me with tenderness from the ground; and conjured me in the mildest accents to be comforted; to pardon the severity of those words which had arisen from fear, that by an imprudent avowal on my part, I should risk both his happiness and my own. He informed me, that, as he was heir to one of the first fortunes in England, he had pledged his honour with his father never to enter into any matrimonial engagement, without first acquainting him with the particulars of the lady and her family. Should he omit this duty, his father declared, that though she were a princess, he would disinherit him, and never again admit him to his presence.

"Consider this, my dear Therese," continued he, "could you endure to behold me a beggar, stigmatized with a parent's curse, when a little forbearance on your side would make all right? I know I have been hasty in acting as I have done, but now I cannot remedy my error. To-morrow I will write to my father, describe your rank and merits, and request his consent for our immediate marriage. The moment his permission arrives, I will cast myself on the count's friendship and feelings, and reveal all that has passed." The tenderness of my husband won my affection and reason to his side; and with many tears I sealed his forgiveness, and pledged my faith on his word.

"My dear deceived parent little suspected the perfidy of his guest. He detained him as his visitor, and often rallied himself on the hold which his distinguished accomplishments had taken on his esteem. Sackville's manner to me in public was obliging and free; it was in private only, that I found the tender, the capricious, the unfeeling husband. Night after night I have washed the memory of my want of duty to my father, with bitter tears. But my husband was dear to me, was more precious than my life. One kind look from him, one fond word, would solace every pain, and make me wait the arrival of his father's letter, with all the gay anticipations of youth and love.

"A fortnight passed away. A month, a long and lingering month. Another month, and a packet of letters was presented to Sackville. He was at breakfast with us. At the sight of the superscription, he coloured, tore open the paper, ran his eyes over a few lines, and then pale and trembling, rose from his seat and left the room. My emotions were almost uncontrolable. I had already half risen from my chair to follow him, when the Count exclaimed, "what can be in that letter? he seems dreadfully shocked." And without observing me, or waiting for a reply, he hurried out after him. I stole to my chamber, where, throwing myself on my bed, I tried by all the delusions of hope, to obtain some respite from inquietude.

"The dinner bell roused me from my fluctuating reverie. Dreading to excite suspicion, and anxious to read in the countenance of my husband the denunciation of our fate, I obeyed the summons, and descended to the dining-room. On entering it, my eyes irresistibly wandered round to fix themselves on Sackville. He was leaning against a pillar, his face pale as death. My father looked grave, but immediately took his seat, and tenderly placed his friend beside him. I sat down in silence. Little dinner was eaten, and few words spoken. As for myself my agitation almost choaked me. I felt that the first word I should attempt to pronounce, must give them utterance, and that their vehemence would betray me.

"When the servants withdrew, Sackville rose, and taking my father's hand, said in a faultering voice, "My lord, I must leave you."—"It is a wet evening;" replied the Count, "besides you are disturbed by the shock you have received. To-morrow will do as well for your business."—"I thank your lordship," answered he, "but I must go to Florence to-night. You shall see me again before to-morrow afternoon: all will then, I hope, be settled to my wish."—"Well if you are resolved," said my father, "God bless you! Remember we shall be anxious to see you again."—Sackville took his hat. Motionless, and incapable of speaking, I sat fixed to my chair, in the direct way he must pass. His eye met mine. He stopped, and looking at me, abruptly caught my hand; and as abruptly quitting it, darted out of the room. I never saw him more.

"I had not the power to dissemble another moment. I fell back weeping into the arms of my father. He did not, even by this imprudence, read what I almost wished him to guess; but with all the indulgence of affection, lamented the distress of Sackville, and the sensibility of my nature, which sympathized so painfully with his friend. I durst not ask what was [illegible] end; abashed at my duplicity to him, and overwhelmed with a thousand dreads, I obtained his permission to retire to my chamber.

"The next day I met him with a serene air; for I had schooled my heart to endure with greater composure the sufferings which it had deserved. The Count did not remark my recovered tranquillity; neither did he appear to think any more of my tears; so entirely was he occupied in conjecturing what could be the cause of Sackville's grief, who had only complained of having received a great shock, without revealing the circumstance. This ignorance of my father surprised me; and to all his suppositions I said little. My soul was too deeply interested in the subject, to trust to the faithfulness of my lips.

"The morning crept slowly on, and the noon appeared to stand still. I anxiously watched the declining sun, as the signal for my husband's return. Two hours had elapsed since his promised time, and my father grew so impatient tha he went out with a view to meet him. I eagerly noped that they might miss each other. I should then see my Sackville a few minutes alone, and by one word be comforted or driven to despair.

"I was listening to every footstep that sounded under the colonade, when my servant brought me a letter, which had just been left by one of Mr. Sackville's grooms. "Ah!" thought I, "this will relieve or confirm my fears! Heaven grant that his father may have consented!" I tore open the seal and fell senseless on the floor, ere I had read half the killing contents—."

Thaddeus with a burning cheek, and a heart all at once robbed of that elastic spring, which till now had ever made him feel the happiest of the happy, took up the letter of his father. The paper was worn, and blistered with his mother's tears. His head seemed to swim, as he contemplated the hand-writing and he said to himself, "Am I to respect or to abhor him?" He proceeded in the perusal.

"To Therese, Countess Sobieski.

"How, Therese, am I to address you? But an attempt at palliating my conduct, will be of no use. It is impossible. You cannot conceive a viler opinion of me than I hold of myself. I know that I deserve to be called a villain; that I have sacrificed your tenderness to my distracted passions. But you shall no more be subject to the caprices of a man who cannot repay your love with his own. You have no guilt to torture you; and you possess virtues that will render you tranquil under every calamity. I leave you to your own innocence: forget the ceremony that has passed between us; my wretched heart disclaims it forever. Your father is happily ignorant of it; pray spare him the anguish of knowing that I was so completely unworthy of his kindness! I feel that I am more than ungrateful to you, and to him. Therese your most inveterate hate cannot more strongly tell me, than I tell myself, that I have treated you like a scoundrel. But I cannot retract. I am going where all search will be vain; and I now bid you an eternal farewell. May you be happier than ever I can be!

"Florence. "R. S—."

Thaddeus went on with his mother's narrative.

"When my senses returned, I was on the ground, holding the half perused paper in my hand Grief and horror had locked up the avenues of complaint and I sat as one petrified to stone. My father entered. At the sight of me, he started as if he had seen a spectre. His well known features, opened at once my agonized heart. With fearful cries, I cast myself at his feet, and putting the letter into his hand, clung almost expiring, to his knees.

"When he had read it, he flung it from him, and dropping into a chair, covered his face with his hands. I looked up imploringly, for I could not speak. My father stooped forward and raising me in his arms, pressed me to his bosom. "My Therese," said he, "it is I who have done this. Had I not harboured this villain, he never could have had an opportunity of ruining the peace of my child." In return for the unexampled indulgence of this speech, I promised to forget a man, who could have so little respect for gratitude, or his own honour. The Count replied, that he expected such a resolution in consequence of the principles he had taught me; and to show me how far dearer to him was my real tranquillity, than any false idea of impossible restitution, he would not remove even from one principality to another, were he sure by that means to discover Mr. Sackville and avenge himself. My understanding assented to the justice of all his reasoning, but long and severe were the struggles, before I could erase from my soul, the image of that being, who had been the lord of all its joys and sorrows.

"It was not till you, my dear Thaddeus, were born, that I could repay the goodness of my father with the smiles of cheerfulness. I christened you Thaddeus Constantine, after himself, and his best loved friend Kosciusko. He would not permit me to give you any name, which could remind him or myself of the cruel parent who gave you being; and on our return to Poland, the story which he related when questioned about my apparently forlorn state, was simply this, "My daughter was married and widowed in the course of two months. Since then, to root from her memory, as much as possible, all recollection of a husband who was only given to be taken away, she still retains my name; and her son as my sole heir, shall wear no other." This reply satisfied every one: the king who was my father's only confidant, gave his sanction to it, and no further inquiries were ever started.

"You are now, my beloved child, entering on the eventful career of life. God knows when the venerable head of your grandfather is laid in dust, and I, too, shut my eyes upon you for ever, where destiny may send you! perhaps to the country of your father. Should you ever meet him—but that is unlikely; so, I will be silent on a subject which eighteen years of reflection, have not yet deprived of its sting.

"Not to embitter the fresh spring of your youth, my Thaddeus, with the draught that has poisoned mine; not to implant in your breast, hâtred of a parent you may never behold, have I written this: but to inform you in fact from whom you sprung. My history is made plain to you, that no unexpected events may hereafter perplex your opinion of your mother; or cause a blush to rise on that cheek for her, which from your grand-father can derive no stain. For his sake as well as for mine, whether in peace or in war, may the angels of heaven guard my boy! This is the everlasting prayer of thy fond mother,

"THERESE SOBIESKI.

"Villanow, March, 1792."

When he had finished, Thaddeus held the papers in his hand; and unable to recover from the shock which he had received by their contents, he read them a second time to the end; then laying them on the table, against which he rested his now aching head, he gave vent to the fulness of his heart.

The Countess, anxious for the effect her history might have on her son, at this instant entered the room. Seeing him in so dejected an attitude, she approached him, and pressing him to her bosom, mingled her tears with his. Thaddeus, ashamed of his emotions, yet incapable of dissembling them, struggled a few moments to release himself from her arms. The Countess mistaking his motive, said in a melancholy voice, "And do you, my son, despise your mother for the weakness which she has revealed? Is this the reception that I expected from a child on whose affection I reposed my confidence and my comfort?"

"No, my mother," replied Thaddeus, "it is your afflictions which have discomposed me. This is the first unhappy hour that I ever endured, and can you wonder that I should be affected? Oh! mother, continued he, laying his hand on his father's letter, "whatever were his rank, had my father been but noble in mind, I would have gloried in bearing his name; but now I put up my prayers never to hear it more."

"Forget him," cried the countess, hiding her eyes with her handkerchief.

"I will," answered Thaddeus, "and allow my memory to dwell only on the virtues of my mother."

It was impossible for the Countess or her son, to conceal their agitation from the palatine, who now opened the door. On his expressing alarm at a sight so unusual, his daughter finding herself incapable of speaking, put into his hand the letter which Thaddeus had just read. Sobieski cast his eyes over the first lines: he immediately comprehended the tendency, and seeing that the Countess had withdrawn her eyes towards his grandson. Thaddeus was walking up and down the room striving to command himself for the conversation which he anticipated with his grand-father.

"I am sorry, Thaddeus," said Sobieski, "that your mother has so abruptly imparted to you the real name and character of your father. I see that his villainy has distressed a heart, which I have sought to make alive to the slightest dishonour. But be consoled, my dear boy, I have prevented the publicity of his conduct, by an ambiguous story of your mother's widowhood. I declared to the world, that you were not only the son of my daughter, but should be the sole heir to my estates and name. Notwithstanding this arrangement, she judged it proper that you ought not to enter general society, without having first been made acquainted with the true events of your birth. I believe my daughter is right. But cheer yourself, my child, now that all is past. You will embitter the remainder of my days, if you suffer the vices of a worthless man to prey upon your mind."

"No my lord," answered his grandson, "you have been more than a parent to me; and henceforward, for your sake, as well as my own, I shall hold it my duty, to forget that I drew my being from any other source than the house of Sobieski."

"You are right," cried the palatine with an exulting emotion, "you have the spirit of your ancestors; and I yet shall live to see you add glory to the name!"

The beaming eyes and smiling lips of the young count, declared that he had shaken sorrow from his heart. His grand-father squeezed his hand with delight; and saw in his recovered serenity the sure promise of his fond prophecy.

CHAPTER II.

The fearful day arrived, when Sobieski and his grand-son were to bid adieu to Villanow and its peaceful scenes.

"The well-poised mind of the veteran, bade his daughter farewell, with a fortitude which imparted some of its strength even to her. But when Thaddeus, ready habited for his journey, entered the room, at the sight of his military accoutrements she shuddered: and when with a glowing countenance, he advanced smiling through his tears towards her, she clasped him in her arms, and rivetted her lips to that face whose very loveliness added to her affection. She gazed at him, she wept on his neck, she pressed him to her bosom. "Oh! how soon may all that beauty be mingled with the dust? how soon may that warm heart, which then beat against her's, be pierced by the sword! be laid on the ground, mangled and bleeding, exposed, and trampled on. These thoughts thronged upon her soul, and deprived her of sense. She was carried away lifeless by her maids; whilst the palatine, almost by force, compelled Thaddeus to quit the spot.

It was not until the lofty battlements of Villanow blended with the clouds, that Thaddeus could throw off his melancholy. The parting agony of his mother hung on his spirits; and heavy and frequent were his sighs, as he gazed on the russet cottages and fertile fields, which reminded him that he was yet passing through the territories of his grandfather. The picturesque mill of Mariemont was the last spot on which his sight lingered. The ivy that mantled over its sides, sparkled with the brightness of a shower that had just fallen; and the rays of a setting sun gleamed on its shattered wall, made it an object of such romantic beauty, as well as interest, that he could not help pointing it out to his fellow travellers.

Whilst the eyes of general Butzou, who was in the carriage, followed the direction of Thaddeus, the palatine observed the heightening animation of his features, with that philantrophy which expands the heart of a good man; and recollecting at the same time the feelings he himself enjoyed, when he visited that place one and twenty years ago, he put his hand on the shoulder of Butzou, and said, "general, did you ever relate to my boy the particulars of that mill?"

"No, my lord."

"I suppose," continued the palatine, "the same reason deterred you from speaking of it uncalled for, as lessened my wish to tell the story; we are both too much the heroes of the tale, to have volunteered the recital."

"Do you mean, my lord," asked Thaddeus, "the rescue of our king from this place?"

"I do."

"I have a very indistinct knowledge of the affair: I remember it was told me many years since, but I have nearly forgotten it; and can only account for my apparent insensibility in never having inquired any further, to the happy thoughtlessness in which you have hitherto permitted me to live."

"But," said the palatine, whose only object was to draw his grandson from saddening reflections; "What will you say to my turning egotist?"

"I now ask the story of you;" returned Thaddeus, smiling; "besides, as soldiers are permitted by the fire side 'to fight their battles o'er again;' your modesty, grandfather, cannot violently object to repeat it to me here, on the way to more."

"As a preliminary," said the palatine, "to relate our history in form, I must suppose that it is unnecessary to tell you that general Butzou was the brave soldier, who, at the imminent risk of his own life saved that of our sovereign?"

"Of course, I know that," replied the young count. "and that you, too, had a share in it; for when I was yesterday presented to his majesty, among other things which he spoke of, he told me that he believed under heaven, he owed his present existence to general Butzou, and yourself"

"So very little to me," resumed Sobieski, "that I will to the best of my recollection, repeat every circumstance of the affair. Should I err, I must beg of you general," turning to Butzou, "to put me right!"

Butzou, with the glow of honest exultation still painting his face, nodded assent; and Thaddeus, bowing to his grandfather in sign of his attention, the palatine began.

"It was on Sunday night, the third of September, in the year 1771, that this event took place. At that time, instigated by the courts of Vienna and Constantinople, the confederate lords of Poland were laying waste their country from one end to the other, and perpetrating all kinds of outrage on the loyal inhabitants.

"Among their numerous crimes, a plan was laid for surprising and taking the king's person. Pulaski was one of the most daring of these rebels; and assisted by Lukawski, Strawenski, Kosinski, three Poles of distinction, he meditated at any rate to accomplish his death. Accordingly, the three latter, in obedience to his orders, with forty other conspirators, met at Czetschokow, and in the presence of their commander, swore with the most horrid oaths, to deliver Stanislaus alive or dead into their hands.

"About a month after this meeting, these noblemen, at the head of a band of assassins, disguised themselves as peasants; and concealing their arms in wagons of hay, which they drove before them, they entered Warsaw unsuspected.

"It was ten o'clock, on the third of September, as I have told you, that they found an opportunity of executing their scheme. They placed themselves, under the cover of the night, in those avenues of the city, through which they knew his majesty must pass in his way from Villanow, where he had been dining with me. His carriage was escorted by four of his own attendants, myself, and twelve of my guards. We had scarcely lost sight of Villanow, when the conspirators rushed out and surrounded us, commanding the coachman to stop, and beating down the men with the butt end of their muskets. Several shot were fired into the coach. One passed through my hat as I was getting out, sword in hand, the better to repel an attack, the motive of which I could not divine. A cut across my right leg with a sabre, soon laid me under the wheels; and whilst I lay there, I heard the shot pouring into the coach like hail, and felt the villains stepping over my body to finish the murder of the king.

"It was then that our friend Butzou (who at that period was a private in my service) stood between his sovereign and the rebels. In one instant he received several balls through his limbs, and a thrust from a bayonet in his breast, which cast him weltering in his blood upon me. By this time, all the persons who had formed the escort, were either wounded or dispersed. Being now secure of their prey, one of the assassins opened the carriage door, and with shocking imprecations, seizing the king by the hair cried, "Tyrant, we have thee now; thy hour is come!" and discharging his pistol so near his majesty's face, that he felt the heat of the flash. A second villain cut him on the forehead with his sword; whilst a third, who was on horseback, laying hold of his collar, between himself and another, at full gallop, dragged him along the ground, through the suburbs of the city.

"During the latter part of this outrageous scene, some of our frightened people returned with a detachment, and seeing Butzou and me almost lifeless, carried us to the royal palace, where all was commotion and alarm. The foot-guards immediately followed the track that the conspirators had seemed to take. In one of the streets they found the king's hat dyed in blood, and his pelisse perfectly reticulated with bullet holes. This confirmed their apprehensions of his death; and they came back filling all Warsaw with dismay.

"The assassins meanwhile got clear of the town.—Finding, however, that the king by loss of blood, weakness, and wounds in his feet, was not likely to exist much longer in their manner of dragging him towards their employer, they set him on a horse, and redoubled their speed. When they came to the moat which surrounds Warsaw, they compelled him to leap across it. In the attempt his beast fell twice; and, at the second fall, broke its leg: they then compelled him, fainting as he was with pain, to mount another and spur it over. The conspirators had no sooner passed the ditch, than they threw his majesty down, and held him there, till Lukawski tore from his neck the ribbon of the black eagle, and its diamond cross. Lukawski was so foolishly sure of his prisoner, that he quitted his charge, and repaired with his spoils to Pulaski, meaning to show them as an incontestible proof of his success. Many of the other plunderers, concluding that they could not do better than follow his example, fled also, and left only seven of the party, with Kosinski at their head, to remain over the unfortunate Stanislaus.

"The night was now grown so dark, that they could not be sure of their way; and their horses stumbling at every step over stumps of trees and hollows in the earth, increased their apprehensions to such a degree, that they obliged the king to keep up with them on foot; he literally marked his path with his blood, his shoes having been torn off in the struggle at the carriage. Thus they continued, wandering backwards and forwards around the outskirts of Warsaw, without any exact knowledge of their situation. The men who guarded him, at last became so much afraid of their prisoner taking advantage of these circumstances to escape, that they repeatedly called on Kosinski, for orders to put him to death. Kosinski refused; but their demands growing more violent and imperious as they found that the intricacies of the forest had involved them completely, the king expected every moment to receive the points of their bayonets in his breast.

"When I recovered from my swoon, and my leg was bound up, I felt myself able to stir; and questioning the officers that stood about my couch, I found that a general panic had seized them. They knew not how to proceed; they shuddered at leaving the king at the mercy of the confederates; and yet were fearful by pursuing them farther, to incense them, through terror and revenge, to massacre their prisoner if he were still alive. I tried what I could to dispel this last dread. Anxious, at any rate to make another attempt to preserve him, though I could not ride myself, I strenuously advised an immediate pursuit on horseback; and that neither darkness nor danger should be permitted to impede their course. A little spirit on the side of the nobles, soon brought back hope and animation to the terrified soldiers; and my orders were instantly obeyed. But I must add, almost as instantly disappointed: For, in less than half an hour they returned in despair, showing me his majesty's coat, which they had found in the fosse. I suppose the ruffians tore it off when they rifled him. It was rent in several places, and so wet with blood, that the officer who presented it to me, declared it as his opinion, that they had murdered the king there, and had drawn away the body, for by the light of the torches he could trace drops of blood to a considerable distance.

"Whilst I was again attempting to combat, this new evidence of his majesty being beyond the reach of succour or of insult, he was driven before the seven conspirators so far into the wood of Bielany, that unknowing whither they went, they came up with one of the guard-houses and to their extreme terror were accosted by a patrole. Four of the banditti immediately disappeared, leaving only two with Kosinski; who much alarmed, forced his prisoner to walk faster, and keep a profound stillness. Notwithstanding all this precaution, scarce a quarter of an hour after, they were challenged by a second watch; and the other two men now taking to flight, left Kosinski full of dismay alone with the king. His majesty, sinking with pain and fatigue, beseeched permission to rest for a moment: Kosinski refused, and pointing his sword towards his breast, compelled him to proceed. The king obeyed in silence.

"As they walked on, the unfortunate Stanislaus, hardly able to drag one limb after the other, observed that his conductor seemed to forget his vigilance, till he appeared at last thoroughly given up to thought. He took courage at this; and conceiving some hope from the manner in which he was agitated, he ventured to say, "I see, that you know not how to proceed. You cannot but be aware that the enterprise you are engaged in, and how it will, is full of peril to you. Successful conspirators are always jealous of each other: Pulaski will find it as easy to rid himself of your life, as to take mine. Avoid this danger; and I will promise you none on my account. Suffer me to enter the convent of Bielany: we cannot be far from it; and then do you provide for your safety." Kosinski, rendered desperate by the circumstances in which he was involved replied, "No; I have sworn! and I would rather sacrifice my life than my honor."

"The king had neither strength nor spirits to make any answer. They continued to break their way through the underwood, till they arrived close to Mariemont. Here Stanislaus, unable to stir another step, fell back against a tree, and again implored for one moment's rest, to recover some power to move. Kosinski now consented. This unexpected humanity gave his majesty courage to employ the minutes during which they sat together, in another attempt to soften his heart, and to convince him that the oath he had taken was atrocious and by no means binding to a brave and virtuous man.

Kosinski heard him with attention, and exhibited strong symptoms of being affected. "But," said he, "if I should assent to what you propose, and re-conduct you back to Warsaw, what will be the consequence to me? I shall be taken and executed."—"I give you my word," answered the king, "that you shall not suffer any injury. But if you doubt my honor, escape while you can. I shall find my way to some place of shelter, and will direct your pursuers to take the opposite road to that which you may choose." Kosinski entirely overcome, threw himself on his knees before his majesty; and, imploring pardon for what he had done, swore, that from this hour he would defend his king against all conspirators, and would trust confidently on his word, for future preservation. Stanislaus repeated his promise of forgiveness and protection; and directing him to seek refuge for them both, in the mill near which they were discoursing, Kosinski obeyed, and knocked, but no one gave answer. He then broke a pane of glass in the window, and through it begged succour for a nobleman who had been waylaid by robbers. The miller refused to come out or let him in; telling them it was his belief they were robbers themselves, and if they did not go away he would fire upon them.

"This dispute had continued for near an hour, when the king contrived to crawl up close to the window, and said "My good friend, if we were banditti, as you suppose, it would be as easy for us, without this parley, to break into your house, as to break this pane of glass; and therefore if you would not incur the shame of suffering a fellow-creature to perish for want of assistance, let us in." This argument had its weight with the man, and opening the door he admitted them. After some trouble, his majesty procured pen and ink, and immediately addressed a few lines to me at the palace; with more difficulty he prevailed on one of the miller's sons to carry it; so fearful were they of falling in with any of the troop whom they understood had plundered their guests.

"The joy I experienced at the sight of this note, I cannot describe. I well remember the contents; they were literally these:

"By the miraculous hand of Providence, I am escaped from the hands of assassins. I am now at the mill of Mariemont. Send as soon as possible, and take me away. I am wounded but not dangerously."

"Regardless of my condition, I instantly got into a carriage, and followed by a detachment of horse arrived at the mill. I met Kosinski at the door, keeping guard with his sword drawn. As he knew my person, he admitted me directly. The king had fallen asleep, and lay in one corner of the hovel, on the ground, covered with the miller's cloak. To see the most virtuous monarch in the world, thus abused by his ungrateful subjects pierced me to the heart; and kneeling down by his side, I took hold of his hand, and in a paroxysm of tears, which I am not ashamed to confess, I exclaimed, "I thank Almighty God that I again see my sovereign alive!" It is not easy to say, how these words struck the simple family with amazement. They instantly dropped on their knees before the king, whom my voice had awakened, and beseeched his pardon for all their ill manners. The good Stanislaus soon quieted their fears; and graciously thanking them for their kindness, told the miller to come to the palace the next day, when he would show him his gratitude in a better way than by promises.

"Five minutes afterwards, the officers of the detachment assisted his majesty and myself into the carriage; and, accompanied by Kosinski, we reached Warsaw about six in the morning."

"Yes," interrupted Butzou, "I remember the joy I felt when the news was brought to me, in my bed, that I had not in vain received the wounds intended for my Sovereign; and besides, his majesty visited his poor soldier in his chamber. Do you recollect my lord, how he was brought into my room in a chair between two men? and how he thanked me, and shook hands with me? It made me like a child."

"But," inquired Thaddeus, hardly recovering from the deep attention with which he had listened to this recital; "what became of Kosinski? I suppose the king kept his word."

"He did indeed, replied Sobieski;" "his word is at all times sacred. Yet I believe Kosinski had his fears that he would not be so generous; for I perceived him look anxious, and change colour very often, whilst he was in the coach. However he was soon tranquilized by his majesty's manner, who when he alighted at the palace in the midst of the joyous cries of the people, shouting, "The king is alive!" leaned upon his arm, in preference to mine, and presented him to the populace as his preserver. The great gate was ordered to be left open; and never, whilst I live, shall I again behold such a scene! every soul in Warsaw, from the highest to the lowest, came running to catch a glimpse of their rescued sovereign; seeing the doors free, they entered without ceremony, and thronged forward in crowds, to get near enough to kiss his hand, or to touch his clothes; then elated with joy, they turned to Kosinski, and loaded him with demonstrations of gratitude, calling him the 'Saviour of their good king.' Kosinski bore all this with surprising firmness; but in a day or two, when the facts of the business became known, he felt that he might meet with different treatment from the people, and therefore petitioned his majesty for leave to depart. Stanislaus consented, and he retired to Semigallia in the papal territories, where he now lives on a very handsome pension from the king."

"For me," said the general, "you see how he has rewarded me for that which had I left undone, I should deserve to be shot. He put it at my option to become what I pleased about his person, or hold what rank I liked in the army. Attached as I have ever been to your family, under which all my ancestors have lived and fought, I vowed in my own mind never to quit it; and accordingly only begged permission of my sovereign to remain with the count Sobieski. I did remain; but see," cried he with his voice faultering, "what they have made of me! I command those troops, among whom it was once my greatest glory to be only a private soldier."

Thaddeus pressed the hand of the veteran between both his, and regarded him with respect and affection, whilst the grateful old man wiped off a tear that was trickling down his face.

"How happy ought it to make you, my son," observed Sobieski, "that you are called out to support such a sovereign? He is not merely a king whom you follow to battle, because he will lead you to honor: the hearts of his people feel him in a different light; they look on him as their friend; as a being delegated by God, to study what is their greatest good, then to bestow it, and when it is attacked to defend it To preserve the life of such a sovereign, who is there that would not sacrifice his own."

"Yes," cried Butzou: "and how ought we to abhor those who threaten his life! how ought we to estimate those crowned heads, who under the mask of amity, have from the year sixty-four when he ascended the throne, till now, been plotting his death! That calamity, Oh Heaven, avert! Happen when it may, it will, I fear, be a prelude to the certain ruin of ou country!"

"Not so," interrupted Thaddeus, with earnestness: "no whilst a Polander has power to lift an arm shall it be quit lost."

Butzou applauded his spirit, and warmly seconded th palatine, who never weary of infusing into every emotion o his grandson an interest for his country, pursued the discours and dwelt minutely on the happy tendency of the glorious con stitution of ninety-one, in defence of which they were no going to hazard their lives. As Sobieski pointed out its seve ral excellencies, and described the pure spirit of freedom whic animated its laws, the feelings of Thaddeus followed his elo quence; with the restraintless fervor of youth he branded th names of Catharine and the faithless Frederick, with some o those epithets, which posterity will not fail to ratify. Durin these conversations, Thaddeus forgot his regrets; and th third day they put themselves at the head of their men, an commenced a regular march.

CHAPTER III.

The little army of the palatine passed by the battlement of Chelm, crossed the Bug into Volhinia, and impatientl counted the leagues over those vast plains, till it reached th borders of Kiovia.

When the column, at the head of which Thaddeus wa stationed, descended the heights of Lininy and the broad cam of his countrymen burst on his sight, he felt his heart swe with an emotion quite new to him, he beheld with admiratio the regular disposition of the entrenchments, the long inte sected streets, and the warlike appearance of the soldier whom he could descry, even at that distance, by the beams o a bright evening sun which shone on their arms.

In half an hour his troops descended into the plain, wher meeting those of the palatine and the general, the thre columns again united, and Thaddeus joined his grandfath in the van.

"My lord," cried he, as they met, "can I behold such sight, and despair of the freedom of Poland!"

Sobieski made no reply; but giving one of those expressiv looks, which immediately make their way to the soul, he con manded the troops to advance with great speed. In a few moments they reached the outworks of the camp, and entered the lines. The eager eye of Thaddeus wandered from object to object. Thrilling with that delight with which youth beholds wonders, and anticipates more, he stopped with the rest of the party before a tent which General Butzou informed him, belonged to the commander-in-chief. They were met in the vestibule, by a hussar officer of a most commanding appearance. Sobieski and he having accosted each oth with mutual congratulations, the Palatine turned ro Thaddeus, took him by the hand, presented him to and said with a smile,

"Here, my dear Kociuszko, this young ma he is called Thaddeus; and I trust he your name nor mine."

Kosciuszko embraced the your pressure of the hand, replied: " father, Thaddeus, you will rec Poland who equalled Stanis comes his descendant, yo the service of your cou

As Kosciuszko fo forward to lead t Poniatowski w most lively whose figu ing assu appoint After his h con alr gave the word in a low whisper to the guard at the door, and proceeded down the lines. The pitying moon seemed to stand in the heavens, watching the awakening of those heroes, who the next day might sleep to rise no more. At another time and in another mood, such might have been his reflections; but now he pursued his walk with far different thoughts; no sensation but those of joy moved his breast. He felt what he only—the light of that beautiful planet, trailing its long of glory across the entrenchments; and a solitary and there, gleaming through the curtained tents, and showing that their inmates were with the same anxiety as himself for the wly on: sometimes pausing at the el: or answering with a start, to patrole; then lingering at the ellings, he offered up a prayer itted the endearments of this spot, a bulwark of s to be a soldier from a trade, by which nd wealth; he and one for desire to ated into orning which ur in vas d of Winnica, before Thaddeus found that his pelisse was wet with dew, and that he ought to return to his tent. He had hardly laid his head upon his pillow, and "lulled his senses in forgetfulness," when he was disturbed by a confused noise, and the drum beating to arms. He opened his eyes; seeing that Sobieski was out of bed, he sprung from his own, and asked what was the matter?

"Only follow me directly," answered his grand-father, as he quitted the tent.

Whilst Thaddeus was putting on his clothes, and buckling on his arms, with a trembling eagerness that almost defeated his haste, an aid-de-camp of the prince's entered. He informed him that an advance guard of the Russians, about three hundred piquets, had attacked one of the Polish outposts, to which lieutenant Lomza had been commanded the evening before; and that his highness had ordered a detachment from the palatine's brigade to march immediately to its relief. Before Thaddeus had time to reply, Sobieski sent in, to apprize his grand-son the prince had appointed him to be second in command, over the troops which were turning out to assist the lieutenant.

Thaddeus heard this message with delight; yet fearful how the event might answer the expectations which this high distinction declared, he issued from his tent, like a youthful Mars, or rather like the young Isadas, trembling at the dazzling effects of his temerity, and hiding his valor and his blushes beneath the waving plumes of his hemlet. Kosciuszko, who was to head the party, observed his modesty with pleasure, and shaking him warmly by the hand, "Go, Thaddeus," said he, "take your station on the left flank; I shall require your fresh spirits to lead the charge I intend to make, and to ensure its success" Thaddeus bowed to these encouraging words, and took his place according to order.

Every thing being ready, the detachment quitted the camp, and dashing through the dews of a sweet morning, for it was yet May, in a few hours arrived in view of the Russian battalions. Lomza who from the only redoubt now in his possession, first caught a glimpse of the welcome reinforcement, rallied his few remaining men, and by the time that Kosciuszko came up, contrived to join him in the van. The fight recommenced. Thaddeus at the head of his hussars, in full gallop, bore down upon the enemy. They received the charge with firmness; but the young leader, perceiving that extraordinary means were necessary, exerted his voice to the utmost; calling on his men to follow him, he put spurs to his horse, and rushed into the thickest of the battle. His soldiers did not shrink; they pressed on, mowing down the foremost ranks, whilst he, by a lucky stroke of his sabre disabled the sword-arm of the Russian standard bearer, and seized the colours. His own troops seeing the standard in his hand, with one accord, in loud and repeated cries, shouted victory. The reserve of the enemy, alarmed at this outcry instantly gave way, and retreating with precipitation, was soon followed by the rear ranks of the centre, where Kosciuszko had already slain the commander of the attack. The flanks next gave ground: and after holding a short stand at intervals, at length turned about and fled, panic struck, across the country.

The conquerors, elated with so sudden a success, put their horses on full speed, and without order or attention, pursued the fugitives with the noise of thunder, till they were lost amidst the trees of a distant wood. Kosciuszko now called on his men to stop; but he called in vain; they continued their career, animating each other, and with redoubled shouts, drowning the voice of their general, and Thaddeus, who galloped forwards, repeating the command till they were met in the entrance of the wood, by a few stragglers, who had formed themselves into a body. It withstood the first onset of the Poles with considerable steadiness; but after a skirmish of ten minutes it fled a second time; and took refuge in the bushes, where, still regardless of orders, their enemies followed. Kosciuszko foreseeing the consequence of this rashness, ordered Thaddeus to dismount part of his squadron, and march after these headstrong men into the forest. He came up with then on the edge of a heathy track of land, just as they were extending their lines to surround a band of arquebusers, who having kept up a quick running fire as they retreated, had drawn their pursuers thus far into the thicket. Heedless of any thing but giving their enemy a complete defeat, the Polanders went on, never looking to the left nor to the right, till all at once, they found themselves encompassed by two thousand Muscovite horse, several battalions of chasseurs, and in front of fourteen pieces of cannon, which this dreadful ambuscade fired upon them, with instant and unremitted violence.

Thaddeus threw himself into the midst of his countrymen, and taking the place of their unfortunate conductor, who had been killed in the first sweep of the artillery, prepared the men for a desperate stand. He gave his orders with intrepidity and coolness: though under a heavy shower of musquetry, and a cannonade which carried death in every round, it was only how to relieve the unlucky Poles from the dilemma into which they had plunged themselves, that occupied his mind. In a few minutes, the scattered soldiers were consolidated into a close phalanx, flanked and reared by the pikemen; 'who stood like a grove of pines in a day of tempest, only moving their heads and arms.' Many of the Russian horse impaled themselves on the sides of this little phalanx, which they vainly attempted to shake, though the ordnance was rapidly weakening its strength. File after file of men were swept down, their bodies making a horrid rampart for their brave comrades, who rendered desperate by slaughter, threw away their most cumbrous accoutrements, and crying to their leader, "Let us escape or die!" followed him sword in hand; and bearing like a torrent upon the enemy's rank, who expected nothing less, cut their way right through the forest. The Russians, exasperated that their prey should not only escape, but escape by such dauntless valour, hung closely on their rear, goading them with musquetry, whilst they (like a wounded lion, hardly pressed by the hunters, who retreats, and yet stands proudly at bay) gradually retired towards the camp, moving with a backward step, their faces towards the foe.

Meanwhile Sobieski, anxious for the fate of the day, had mounted the dyke, and looked eagerly around for the arrival of some messenger from the little army. As the wind blew strongly from the south, a cloud of dust precluded his view; but from the nearer approach of the firing, and the clashing of arms, he was led to fear that his friends had been defeated, and were thus retreating towards the camp. He quitted the lines instantly, to call out a fresh reinforcement, when the enemy, at the sight of Kosciuszko and his squadron on the full charge, suddenly halted and wheeling round, left the harrassed Polanders to enter the trenches in quiet.

Thaddeus, covered with dust and blood, flung himself into his grandfather's arms. In the heat of action, his left arm had been wounded by a Cossac; fearful that the bleeding might disable him from further service, at the moment it happened, he bound it up in his sash, and had thought no more of it until the palatine now remarked the stains upon his cloak and the bosom of his shirt.

"My hurt is slight, my dear sir:" said he, "wish to heaven, it were all the evil that has befallen us to-day! Look at the remnant of our brave comrades."

Sobieski turned his eyes on the panting soldiers, and on Kosciuszko who was inspecting them. Some, no longer upheld by desperation, were sinking with wounds and fatigue; these the good general ever mindful of the comforts of his men, was sending off in litters to the medical department: and others who had sustained the conflict of the day without meeting any personal harm, after having received the praise and admonition of their commander, were dismissed to their quarters.

Before this inspection was half over, the Palatine found it necessary to assist Thaddeus to his tent, who in spite of his exertions to the contrary, had become so faint, that he rather staggered than walked as he was led off the ground.

A very short time perfectly restored him; and with his arm in a sling, he joined his brother officers on the fourth day at the parade. After the duty of the morning, he heard with concern, that during his confinement, frequent skirmishes had taken place between his countrymen and their adversaries, in which they found, that the Russians had augmented their force to such a tremendous strength that it would be impossible for the Poles to remain longer at Winnica, without incurring the danger of being surrounded, and cut to pieces. In consequence of this, the Prince held a council late the preceding night, in which it was determined that the camp should be immediately razed and removed towards Zielime.

This news displeased Thaddeus, who in fairy dreams of war, always added conquest, as the sure end of his battles; and many were the sighs he drew, when next day, at an hour before dawn, he witnessed the striking of the tents, which he thought to be only the prelude to a shameful flight from the enemy. While he was standing by the sides of the busy people, and musing on the nice line which divides prudence from pusillanimity, his grandfather came up, and desiring him to mount his horse, told him by reason of the unhealed state of his wound, that he was not to take his appropriate place in the vanguard, but to march in the centre, along with the Prince and his suite. Thaddeus very warmly remonstrated against this arrangement: he called his hurt a mere scratch; and almost reproached the Palatine for forfeiting his promise, that he should always be stationed near him. Sobieski would not be moved, either by argument or entreaty. Thaddeus finding he neither could nor ought to oppose him, obeyed and followed an aid-de-camp to his highness.

After a march of three hours, the army came in sight of Volunna, when the advanced guard suddenly halted. Thaddeus who was about half a mile to its rear, with a throbbing heart heard that a momentous pass must be disputed before they could proceed. He curbed his horse; then almost gave it the spur, so eagerly did he wish to penetrate the cloud of smoke which rose in volumes from the discharge of musketry, on whose wing at every round he dreaded it might carry the fate of his grandfather. At last the firing ceased, and the troops were commanded to go forward. On entering the contested defile, Thaddeus shuddered; for at every step the heels of his charger struck upon the wounded or dead. There lay his enemies, here lay his friends; his respiration felt suffocated; his eyes clung to the ground, expecting each moment to fasten themselves on the body of his grandfather.

Again the tumult of battle presented itself. About a hundred soldiers, in one firm rank, stood at the end of the pass, firing on the rear-guard of the Russians which was rapidly dispersing. Thaddeus checked his horse. Five hundred had been detached to this post; how few remained! Could he hope Sobieski had escaped such a desperate rencontre? Fearing the worst, and dreading to have those fears confirmed, his heart sickened when he received the orders of Poniatowski, to examine the extent of the loss. He rode up close to the mouth of the defile. He could no where see the Palatine. A few of the hussars, a little in advance, were engaged over a heap of the killed, as if defending it from a troop of chasseurs, who appeared fighting for the barbarous privilege of trampling on the bodies. Thaddeus, at this sight, and impelled by despair, called out "Courage, soldiers! the prince is here." The chasseurs looked forward, saw that the information was true, and took to flight. Poniatowski, almost at the word, was by the side of his young friend, who unconscious of any thing but a filial solicitude, had immediately dismounted.

"Where is the palatine?" cried he to a soldier, who was stooping towards the slain he had attempted to defend. The man made no answer, but lifted from the heap the bodies of two soldiers, which lay at top; beneath these, Thaddeus saw the pale and deadly features of his grandfather. He staggered a few paces back, when the prince thinking that he was falling, put out his arm to catch him; but he recovered himself, and flew forward to assist Kosciuszko, who had raised the head of the palatine upon his knee.

"Is he alive?" cried Thaddeus.

"He breathes."

Hope was now as warm in his breast, as it had been cold; they soon released Sobieski from the surrou dead; but his swoon continuing, the prince desired l be laid on a bank, until a litter could be brought fro rear ranks to convey him to a place of security. Mea Thaddeus and the general bound up his wounds, and p some water into his lips. The effusion of blood stopped, the brave veteran opened his eyes; and in minutes, whilst he leaned on the bosom of his gra was so far recovered, as to receive, with his usual n dignity, the thanks of his Highness for the intrepidity which he had preserved a passage that ensured the of the whole army.

Two surgeons arrived with the litter, and relieve anxiety of the by-standers, with the assurance tha wounds which they had re-examined, did not appear dangerous. Having laid their patient on the vehicle, were preparing to retire with it into the rear, when deus petitioned the prince to grant him permission to the command of the guard that was appointed to s his grandfather.—His highness consented; but So positively gave his negative.

"No Thaddeus," said he, "you forget the effect th this solicitude about so trifling a matter might have o men. Remember that he who goes into battle, only his own life to hazard; but he who abandons the sports with the lives of his soldiers. Do not give leave to suppose, that your dearest interest could tem from the front of danger, when it is your duty to rem Thaddeus obeyed his grandfather in silence; and at o'clock the army resumed their march.

Near Zielime, the prince was saluted by count Po at the head of some fresh troops which he had coll at Zaslow. This succour appeared very seasonable. scouts brought information, that directly across the the Russians under the command of general Brinicki doubled their numbers, and were drawn up in order of to dispute their progress.

Thaddeus for the first time shuddered at the sight o enemy. Should his friends be defeated, what might b fate of his grandfather, now rendered helpless by his wou Occupied by these fears, with anxiety in his heart and l

he kept his place at the head of the light horse close to the hill. Prince Poniatowski ordered the lines to extend themselves, that the right should reach to the river, and the left be covered by a rising ground, on which were mounted seven pieces of ordnance. Immediately after these dispositions the battle commenced. It continued with violence and unabating fury, from eight in the morning until sunset. Several times during the contest, the Poles were driven from the ground; but recovering themselves and animated by their commanders, they prosecuted the fight with advantage. General Brinicki perceiving that the fortune of the day was going against him, called up the body of reserve consisting of four thousand men, besides several cannon, for which they erected temporary batteries in a few minutes, with this unsuspected addition of new forces, he opened a rapid and destructive fire on the Polanders, who, already sinking with the fatigue of marching and the heat of the sun, were now on the point of giving way. Kosciuszko, alarmed at the retrogade motion of the troops, gave immediate orders for a close attack on the enemy in front, whilst Thaddeus, at the head of his hussars, should wheel round the hill of artillery, and with loud cries, charge the opposite flank. This stratagem succeeded. The Cossacs who were posted on that spot, seeing the impetuosity of the Poles, and the quarter from whence they came, supposing them to be a fresh squadron, gave ground, and opening in all directions, threw their own people into confusion that completed the defeat. Kosciuszko and the prince were equally successful, where they attacked; and a general panic among their adversaries was the consequence. The whole of the Russian army now took to flight, except a few regiments of carbiniers, who were entangled between the river and the Poles. These were immediately surrounded by a battallion of Masovian infantry, which, enraged at the loss its body had sustained the preceding day, was answering their cries for quarter, with reproach and derision. At this instant, the Sobieski squadron, who were scouring the field, came up, and Thaddeus, who saw the perilous situation of these regiments, directly ordered that they might be taken prisoners, and the slaughter cease. The Masovians exhibited strong signs of dissatisfaction at these commands; but the young count charging through them, ranged his troops before the Russians, and threatened that the first man who would dare to lift a sword against his order should be shot. The Poles dropped their arms. The poor carbiniers fell on their knees to thank his mercy; while their officers in a sullen silence, which seemed ashamed of gratitude, surrendered their swords into the hands of their deliverers.

During this scene, only one very young Russian appeared wholly refractory. He held up his sword in a menacing posture, when Thaddeus, who was approaching, drew near; and before he had time to speak, the young man made a lounge at his breast, which one of his hussars parrying with great dexterity, struck him to the earth: he would have killed him on the spot, had not Thaddeus caught the blow on his own sword, and instantly dismounting, raised the officer from the ground, apologizing for the hasty zeal of his soldier, the youth blushed, and bowing, presented his sword, which was received, and directly returned.

"Brave sir," said he, "I feel myself enobled in restoring this sword to one, who so courageously defended it."

The Russian made no other reply than by a second bow, and putting his hand to his breast, which was wet with blood. Ceremony was now at an end. Thaddeus never considered the unfortunate as strangers; accosting the wounded young soldier with a friendly voice, he assured him of his services, and made him lean on his shoulder. The officer incapable of speaking, accepted the assistance of his enemy; but before the conveyance arrived for which two men had been despatched, he fainted in his arms. Thaddeus, who was obliged to join the prince with his prisoners, very unwillingly left the young Russian in this situation. Before he did so, he directed one of his lieutenants to stay behind, and take care that the surgeons should pay attention to the officer, and have his litter carried next to the palatine's during the rest of the march.

When the army halted at nine o'clock, preparations were made to fix the camp; and in case of a surprisal from any part of the dispersed enemy which might have rallied, orders were delivered for throwing up a dyke. Thaddeus, having been assured that his grandfather and the wounded Russian were comfortably stationed together, did not hesitate to accept with alacrity the command of the entrenching party; to that end, he wrapped himself loosely in his pelisse, and prepared for a long watch. The night was beautiful. It being the month of June, a softening warmth still floated through the air, as if the moon which shone over his head, emitted heat as well as splendour. His mind was in unison with the season. He rode slowly round, from bank to bank, sometimes speaking to the workers in the fosse, sometimes lingering for a few minutes looking on the ground, he thought on the element of which he was composed, to which he might so soon return! then gazing upwards, he observed the silent march of the stars, and the moving scene of the heavens! On whatever he cast his eyes, his soul, which the recent events had dissolved into a temper not the less delightful for being tinged with melancholy, dwelt with intense feeling on the littleness of human pride, when opposed to the grandeur of eternity. He looked with pity over that wide tract of land, which now lay betwixt him and the remains of those four thousand Russians who had fallen a sacrifice to the insatiate desires of ambition. He well knew the difference between a defender of his own country, and the invader of another's. He felt his heart beat, his soul expand, at the prospect of securing liberty and life to a virtuous people; while he could only imagine, how that spirit must shrink from reflection, which would animate the head and hands of a self-condemned slave, to fight, not merely to fasten chains on others, but to rivet his own still closer. The best affections of man having put the sword into the hands of Thaddeus, his principles as a philosopher, did not rebel in the smallest degree against his passion for arms. When he was told that the fortifications were finished, he retired with a tranquil step and smiling countenance, towards the Masovian quarters. He found the palatine awake, and eager to welcome him with the joyful reply to his anxious inquiries, that his wounds were so slight as to promise a speedy amendment. Thaddeus asked for his prisoner. The palatine said, "he is in the next tent, where, according to your desire, the surgeon never leaves him; and he has given a very favourable opinion on the wound which was a shot through the muscles of the breast."

"Have you seen him, my dear sir?" asked Thaddeus, "does he express himself as if he felt at ease, and thought himself well treated?"

"Yes," replied the palatine. "I was supported into his marquee, before I retired to my own. I told him who I was, and repeated your offers of service. He received what I said with lively expressions of gratitude; and at the same time declared that he had nothing to blame, but his own folly, in bringing him to the state in which he then was."

"How, my lord?" asked Thaddeus, rather surprised, "does he repent of being a soldier? Or is he ashamed of the cause for which he fought?"

"Both, Thaddeus: he is no Russian, but a young English man."

"An Englishman! and raise his arm against a country struggling for liberty!"

"It is very true," returned the palatine; "but as he has confessed, that it was his folly, and the persuasions of others, which impelled him, he merits pardon; he is a mere youth; I think hardly your age. I understand that he is of rank; and having undertaken the tour of Europe under the direction of a travelling governor, he took Russia in his map of route. At Petersburgh he became intimate with many of the nobility, particularly with count Brinicki, at whose house he resided; and when his lordship was named to the command of the army in Poland, Mr. Somerset, (for that is your prisoner's name,) instigated by his own volatility and the arguments of his host, volunteered with him; and so followed his friend, to oppose that freedom here, which he would have asserted in his own nation."

Thaddeus thanked his grandfather for this information; and pleased that the young man who had so much interested him, was any thing but a Russian, he instantly repaired to his tent.

A generous heart is as eloquent in acknowledging benefits, as it would be bounteous in bestowing them; and Mr. Somerset received his preserver with the warmest demonstrations of gratitude. Thaddeus begged him not to consider himself as particularly obliged by a conduct which every soldier of honour has a right to expect from another. The Englishman bowed his head, and Thaddeus sat down by his bed-side, where he remained conversing for near an hour.

Whilst he gathered from his own lips a corroboration of the narrative of the palatine, he could not forbear inquiring how a person of his apparent candid nature, and who was also the native of a soil where liberty had so long been the palladium of its happiness, could volunteer in a cause the end of which was to make a brave people slaves.

Somerset listened to these questions with blushes; and they did not leave his face when he confessed, that all he could say in extenuation of what he had done, was to plead his youth, and having thought little on the subject.

"I was wrought upon," continued he, "by a variety of circumstances; first, the principles of Mr. Loftus, my governor, are strongly in favour of the court of Petersburgh: secondly, my father disliked the army, and I adored it; this was the only opportunity in which I might ever satisfy my worthy son; and, lastly, I believe I was dazzled by the picture which the young men about me drew of the campaign. I longed to be a soldier; they persuaded me; and I followed them to the field, as I would have done to a ball-room, heedless of the consequence."

"Yet," replied Thaddeus, smiling, "from the intrepidity with which you maintained your ground when your arms were demanded, any one might have thought that your whole soul, as well as your body, was engaged in the cause."

"To be sure," returned he, "I was a blockhead to be there; but when there, I should have despised myself forever, had I given up my honour into the hands of those ruffians, who would have wrested my sword from me! But when you came, noble Sobieski, it was the fate of war, and I confided myself to a brave man."

CHAPTER IV.

Each succeeding morning not only brought fresh symptoms of recovery to the two invalids, but condensed the interest and admiration of the young men, into an ardent esteem.

It is not the disposition of youthful minds to weigh for months and years, the sterling value of those qualities which attract them. As soon as they see virtue, they respect it; as soon as they meet kindness, they believe it; and as soon as a union of both presents itself, they love it. Not having passed through the disappointments of a delusive world, they grasp, for reality, every pageant that appears. They have not yet admitted that cruel doctrine, which, when it takes effect, creates and extends the misery it affects to cure. Whilst we give up our souls to suspicion, we gradually learn to deceive; whilst we repress the fervors of our own hearts, we freeze those which approach us; whilst we cautiously avoid occasions of receiving pain, we at every remove acquire an unconscious influence to inflict anguish on those who follow us. They, again, meet from our conduct and lips the reason and the lesson, to obliterate the expanding sensibilities of their nature; and thus the tormenting chain of deceived and deceiving characters is lengthened to infinitude.

About the latter end of the month, Sobieski received a summons desiring his immediate attendance at court, where a Diet was to be held in consequence of the victory at Zielince;

to consider of future proceedings. With this letter, his majesty inclosed a collar and investiture of the order of St. Stanislaus, as an acknowledgment of service to the young Thaddeus, with a note from himself, expressing his commands that he would return with the palatine and the other generals, to receive thanks from the throne.

Thaddeus, half wild with delight at the thoughts of so soon meeting his mother, ran to the tent of his British friend to communicate to him the tidings. Somerset participated in all his pleasures; and, with sensations equally warm, accepted the invitation to go with him to Villanow.

"I would follow you, my friend," said he, squeezing the hand of Thaddeus, who was eagerly describing the merits of the Countess and the beauties of his home, "all over the world."

"Then I will take you to the most charming spot in it!" cried he, "Villanow is a perfect paradise; and my mother, the dear angel, that would make a desert so to me."

"You speak so rapturously of your enchanted castle, Thaddeus," returned his friend, "that I do believe I shall have to consider my knight-errantry, in being fool enough to thrust myself amid a fray in which I had no business, as one of the wisest decisions of my life!"

"I consider it," replied Thaddeus, "as one of the luckiest events in mine."

Before the Palatine quitted the camp, Somerset thought proper to acquaint Mr. Loftus, who was yet at Petersburgh, of the particulars of his late danger; and that he was going to Warsaw with his new friends, where he would remain for several weeks. He also added, that as the court of Poland, through the intercession of the palatine, had generously given him his liberty, he should be able to see every thing in that country worthy of investigation; and that he would write to him again, inclosing letters for England, soon after his arrival at the capital.

The weather continuing fine, the party left Zielime in a few days; and the palatine and Somerset, being so far restored from their wounds, that they could walk about, the one with a crutch, and the other by the support of his friend's or a servant's arm; they went through the journey with animation and pleasure. The benign wisdom of Sobieski, the intelligent enthusiasm of Thaddeus, and the playful vivacity of Somerset, all mingling together, made the minutes fly even as fast as their wishes, till a week more carried them into the palatinate of Masovia, and soon after within the walls of Villanow.

Every thing that presented itself to Mr. Somerset was new and fascinating. He saw, in the domestic felicity of his friends, scenes which reminded him of the social harmony of his own home. He beheld, in the palace and the retinue of Sobieski, all that magnificence which bespoke the descendant of a great king, who even wanted nothing of a royal grandeur but the crown, which he had the magnanimity to think and declare was then placed upon a more worthy brow. Whilst Somerset venerated this true patriot, the high tone which his feelings acquired, was not lowered by associating with characters who were nearer the common standard. The friends of Sobieski were men of tried probity: men, who at all times preferred their country's welfare before their own particular interest. The most distinguished among them, were the counts Malchowski, Potocki, Puchala, and the prince Cassimer Sapieha. Mr. Somerset, day after day, listened with deep attention to these virtuous and energetic noblemen. He saw them full of fire and personal courage when the affairs of Poland were the subject of discourse; and he beheld with amaze and admiration, their perfect forgetfulness of their own individual safety, in their passion for the general good. In these moments, he felt his heart bowing down before them; and all the ancient pride of a Briton distend his breast, when he thought that such men as these are, his ancestors were. He remembered how often their almost chivalric virtues used to occupy his reflections, in the picture-gallery at Somerset castle: and his doubts, when he compared what is, with what was, that history had glossed over the actions of past centuries; or else, what a different order of men lived then from those which now inhabited the world. Thus, studying the sublime characters of Sobieski and his friends; and enjoying the endearing kindness of Thaddeus and his mother, did a fortnight pass away, without his even recollecting his promise of writing to his governor. At the end of that period, however, he stole an hour from the countess's society, and enclosed in a short letter to Mr. Loftus, the following epistle to his mother:

"To Lady Somerset, Somerset-Castle, Leicestershire.

"Many weeks ago, my dearest mother, I wrote a letter of seven sheets from Petersburgh, which, long ere this, you and ather must have received. I there attempted to ome idea of the manners of Russia, with the face of the country; and my vanity whispers, that I succeeded tolerably well. The court of the famous Catharine, and the attentions of the hospitable count Brinicki, were then the subject of my pen.

"But how shall I account for being here? How shall I allay your surprise and displeasure, on seeing that this letter is dated from Warsaw? I know that I have acted against the wish of my father, in visiting one of those countries which he had interdicted. I know that I have disobeyed your commands, in taking up arms at any period of my life, without an indispensible necessity: but I have nothing to allege in my defence. I fell in the way of temptation, and I yielded to it. I really cannot enumerate all the things which induced me to volunteer with the Russians; suffice it to say, that I did so, and that we were defeated by the Poles at Zielime: and as heaven has rather rewarded your prayers than punished my imprudence, I trust you will do the same, and pardon an indiscretion that I will never repeat.

"Notwithstanding all this, I must have lost my life through my folly, had I not been preserved, even in the moment when death was pending over me, by a young officer with whose family I now am. The very sound of their title will create your respect; for we of the Patrician order, have a strange tenacity in our belief, that virtue is hereditary, and in this instance our creed is duly honoured. The title is Sobieski; the family which bears it, is the only remaining posterity of the great monarch of that name; and the count who is at its head is palatine of Masovia, which, next to the throne, is the first dignity in the state. He is one of the warmest champions in favour of the invaded rights of his country; and though born to command, he has so far transgressed that golden law of despotic rulers, 'Ignorance and subjection' that throughout his territories every man is taught to worship his God with his heart as well as his knees. The understandings of his peasants are awakened to all useful knowledge; he does not put books of science and speculation into their hands vainly to consume their time in idleness. He gives them the Bible, and implements of industry, to afford them the means of knowing, and of practising their duty. All Masovia, around his palace, blooms like a garden. The cheerful faces of the farmers, and the blessings which they implore on the family, as I s in the fields with the young count, (for in this coun-the sons bear the same title with their fathers,) have drawn a few delightful drops from the eyes of 'thoughtless son!' I know, mother, that you think ve nothing sentimental about me; else you would not ften have poured into my not inattentive ears, that it is he feelings of the heart we are to estimate the pleas of earth and heaven; shut our eyes against them, we are nicely constructed speculums, which reflect the ities of nature, but enjoy none. You see mama, that th remember and adopt your lessons.

Thaddeus Sobieski is the grandson of the palatine, and last of his illustrious race. It is to him that I owe preservation of my life, at Zielime, and much of my piness since; for he is not only the bravest, but the t amiable young man in the kingdom; and he is my id. Indeed, as things happened, you must think that of evil has come good; though I have been disobedient, fault has introduced me to the affection of people se friendship henceforward will prove the greatest pleasure ıy days. The mother of Thaddeus is the only daughter he palatine; and of her, I can only sum up that nog on earth can more remind me of you; she is equally ming, equally tender to your son.

Whilst the palatine is engaged at the Diet, her ladyship, ddeus and myself, with now and then a few visitors from rsaw, form the most agreeable parties you can imagine.
walk together, we read together, we converse together, ing together; at least the countess sings to us; which is he same; and you know that time flies swiftly on the gs of harmony. She has an uncommonly sweet voice, and ste which I never heard paralleled. By the way you can-imagine any thing more beautiful than the Polish music.
artakes much of that delicious languor, so distinguished he Turkish airs, with a mingling of those wandering odies, which the now forgotten composers must have ht from the Tartars. In short, whilst the Countess is ing I hardly suffer myself to breathe; and I feel, just t our poetical friend, William Scarsdald, said a twelve-th ago, at a concert of yours, 'I feel as if love sat upon heart, and flapped it with his wings.'

I have tried all my powers of persuasion to prevail on charming countess to visit our country. I have over and again told her of you, and described you to her; that you are near her own age; (for this lovely woman, though she has a son near nineteen, is not more than forty;)that you are as fond of your Ordinary boy as she is of her peerless one; that, in fine, you and my father will receive her, and Thaddeus, and the palatine, with open arms and hearts, if they will condescend to visit our humble home, at the end of the war. I believe, that I have repeated my entreaties, both to her ladyship and my friend, regularly every day, since my arrival at Villanow; but always with the same ill success; she smiles, and refuses; and Thaddeus 'shakes his ambrosial curls' with a very 'godlike frown' of denial; I hope self-denial in compliment to his mother's cruel and unprovoked negative.

"Before I proceed, my dear mother, I must give you some idea of the real appearance of this palace. I recollect your having read a superficial account of it in the few slight sketches that have been published in England of Poland; but the pictures which they exhibit are so faint, that they hardly resemble the original. Pray do not laugh at me if I begin in the true descriptive style! you know, there is only one way to draw houses and lands, and rivers; so that no blame can be attached to me as, will'e nill'e, I take the beaten path. To commence:—

"When we left Zielime, and advanced in the province of Masovia, the country around Prague rose at every step in fresh beauty. Then numberless chains of gently swelling hills, which encompass it on each side of the Vistula, were in some parts chequered with corn-fields, meadows and green pastures, covered with sheep whose soft bleating thrilled in my ears, and transported my senses into new regions; so different were my charmed and tranquilized feelings, from that tossing of mind, attendant on the horrors I had recently witnessed. Surely, there is nothing in the rational world short of the most undivided reciprocal attachment, that has such power over the workings of the human heart, as the mild sweetness of nature. The most ruffled temper, when emerging from the town, will subside into a perfect calm, at the sight of a wide stretch of landscape reposing in the twilight of a fine evening. It is then, that the balm of peace settles upon the heart, unfetters the spirit, and elevates the soul to the creator. It is then that we behold the parent of the universe in his works: when we see his grandeur in earth, sea, and sky; feel his affection, in the emotions which they raise: and half mortal, half etherialized, forget where we are, in the anticipation hat that world must be, of which this lovely earth is ly the shadow.

utumn seemed to be unfolding all her beauties, to greet turn of the palatine. In one part, the hay-makers were ng the hay, and heaping it into stacks; in another the rs were gathering up the wheat, with a troop of rosy gleaners behind them; each of whom might have ed the proudest Palemon in christendom, to have ed her toil into 'a gentle duty.' Such a landscape, inter-ed with the little farms of these honest people, whom hilanthropy of Sobieski had rendered free, (for it is a of his expansive domains that I am describing, gave me tions that reminded me of Somerset. These cottages spersed among the deep hollows of the vales, and are peeping from amid the thick umbrage of the woods, cover the face of the hills. The irregular forms and ed roofs, with many of the infant inhabitants playing doors, compose such lovely groups, that I could only for our dear Mary's pencil and fingers, (for alas! that nine are motionless!) to transport them to your eyes.

he palace of Villanow, which is castellated, and stands midst of a fortress, now burst upon my view. It rears battled head from the summit of a hill, that gradually down towards the Vistula, and borders to the south ain of Vola; a spot so long famous for the election of ings of Poland. On the north of the building, the earth into natural ramparts, which rise in a high succession, ey reach the foundations of the palace, where they nate in a noble terrace. These ramparts, covered with overlook the stone-outworks, and spread down to the n of the hill, which being clothed with fine trees and iant underwood, form such a rich and verdant base to the ss, as I have not language to describe; were I privileged poetical, I would say that it reminds me of the god of leeping amid roses in the bower of love. Here, the eye wander over the gifts of bounteous nature, arraying hill lale in all the united treasures of spring and autumn.
forest stretches its yet unsunned arms to the breeze;
t that breeze comes laden with the fragrance of the tented and the thousand sweets breathed from those flowers
, in this delicious country, weep honey.

magnificent flight of steps led us from the foot of the arts up to the gate of the palace. We entered it; and presently surrounded by a train of attendants, in such sumptuous liveries, that I found myself all at once carried back into the fifteenth century, and might have fancied myself within the courtly halls of our Tudors and Plantagenets. You can better conceive, than I can recapitulate, the scene which took place between the palatine, the countess, and her son. I can only repeat, that from that hour I have experienced no default of happiness but what arises from regret that my dear family are not partakers with me.

"You know, that this stupendous building was the favourite residence of John Sobieski; and that he erected it, as a resting place from the labours of his long and glorious reign. I cannot move without meeting some vestige of that truly great monarch. I sleep in his bedchamber: there hangs his portrait, dressed in the robes of sovereignty; here are suspended the arms, with which he saved those kingdoms, which are now coalescing to the destruction of Poland. On one side is the library: on the other, the little chapel, in which he used to pay his morning and evening devotions. Wherever I look, my eye finds some object, to excite my reflections and emulation. The noble dead appear to address me from their graves, and I blush at the inglorious life I might have pursued, had I never visited this house and its inhabitants; yet, my dearest mother, I do not mean to reproach you; nor to insinuate that my reverend father, and brave ancestors, have not set me examples as bright, as man need follow; but human nature is capricious; we are not to be stimulated so much with what is always in our view, as by sights which, rising up when we are removed from our customary associations, surprise and captivate our attention. Villanow has only awakened me to the same lesson, which I have conned over in drowsy carelessness at home. Thaddeus Sobieski is hardly one year my senior; but, good Heaven! what has he not done? What has he not acquired? Whilst I abused the indulgence of my parents, and wasted my days in riding, shooting, and walking the streets, he was learning to act as a man of rank ought to act; and by seizing every opportunity to serve the state, he has obtained a rich reward, in the respect and admiration of his country. I am not envious, mother, but I now feel the truth of Cæsar's speech, when he declared 'that the reputation of Alexander would not let him sleep.' Nevertheless, I dearly love my friend; I murmur at my own demerits, not at his worth.

"I have scribbled out all my paper, otherwise I verily believe that I would write more; however, I promise you another letter, in a week or two. Meanwhile I shall send this packet to Mr. Loftus, who is at Petersburgh, to forward to you. Adieu, my dear mother; I am, with reverence to my father and yourself,

"Your truly affectionate son,

"PEMBROKE SOMERSET.

"Villanow, August, 1792."

"TO LADY SOMERSET, SOMERSET-CASTLE, ENGLAND.

(Written three weeks after the preceding.)

"You know, my dear mother, that your Pembroke is famous for his ingenious mode of showing the full value of every favour he confers; can I then lose the opportunity of telling you, what I have left to make you happy with this epistle?

"About five minutes ago, I was sitting on the lawn at the feet of the Countess reading to her and the princess Sapieha, the charming poem of 'The Pleasures of Memory;' as both these ladies understand English, they were admiring it, and paying many compliments to the graces of my delivery, when the palatine presented himself, and told me, that if I had any commands for Petersburgh, I must prepare them, for a messenger was to set off to-morrow morning by day-break. I instantly sprang up, threw my books into the hands of Thaddeus; and here I am in my own room scribbling to you.

"Even at the moment in which I dip my pen in the ink, my hurrying imagination paints on my breast the situation of my beloved home. When this letter reaches you I think I see you and my good aunt, seated on the blue sofa in your dressing-room, with your needle-work on the little table before you; I see Mary, in her usual nook, the recess by the old harpsichord; and my dear father bringing in this happy letter from your son! I must confess that this romantic kind of fancy-sketch makes me feel rather oddly; very unlike, indeed, from what I felt a few months since, when I was a mere, indifferent, unreflecting, unappreciating coxcomb. Well, it is now made evident to me, that we never know the blessings of existence till we are separated from the possession of them. Absence tightens the string that unites friends as well as lovers; at least, I find it so; and though in the fruition of every good on this side the ocean, yet my happiness renders me ungrateful, and I repine that I enjoy it alone. Positively,

I must bring you all here to pass a summer; or come back at the termination of my travels, and carry away this dear family by main force to England.

"Tell my cousin Mary, that, either way, I shall present to her esteem the most accomplished of human beings; but I warn her not to fall in love with him, neither in propria personæ, nor by his public fame, nor with his private character. Tell her, 'he is a bright and particular star,' neither in her sphere nor in any other woman's. In this way, he is as cold as 'Dian's crescent;' and to my great amazement too, for when I throw my eyes over the many lovely young women, who, at different times, fill the drawing-room of the Countess, I cannot but wonder at the perfect indifference with which he views their (to me) irresistible attractions.

"He is polite and attentive to them all; he talks with them, smiles with them, and treats them with every active complacency; but they do not live one instant in his memory. I mean they do not occupy his particular wishes; for with regard to every respectful sentiment towards the sex in general, and esteem to some amiable individuals, he is as lively as in the other case he is dead. The fact is, he never casts one thought upon himself; kindness is spontaneous to his nature; his sunny eyes shine over all, with modest benignity; and his frank and glowing conversation is directed to every rank of people; who imbibe it with an avidity and love, which makes its way to his heart without awakening his vanity. Thus, whilst his fine person, and splendid actions, fill every eye and bosom, I see him moving in the circle, unconscious of his eminence, and the interest he excites.

"Instigated by such an example, to which his high quality as well as extraordinary merit gives so great an influence, many of the younger nobility have been led to enter the army. This circumstance, added to the detail of his bravery and uncommon talents in the field, has made him an object of universal regard; and in consequence, wherever he is seen he meets with applause and acclamations; nay, even at the appearance of his carriage in the streets of Warsaw, the passengers take off their hats and pray for him till he is out of sight. It is only then that I perceive his cheek flushed with the conviction that he is adored.

"It is this, Thaddeus," said I to him one day, when walking out together, we were obliged to retire into the royal palace, from the crowds that followed him; "It is this, my dear friend, that shields your heart against the sorrows of love

You have no place for that passion; your mistress is glory, and she courts you."

"My mistress is my country," replied he; "at present, I desire no other. For her I would die; for her only I would wish to live." While he spoke, the energy of his soul blazed in his eyes; I smiled.

"You are an enthusiast, Thaddeus."

"Pembroke!" returned he, in a surprised and reproachful tone.

"I do not think you one," resumed I, laughing; "but there are many in my country, who hearing these sentiments, would not scruple to call you mad."

"Then I pity them," returned Thaddeus. "Men who cannot ardently feel, cannot taste supreme happiness. My grandfather educated me at the feet of patriotism; and when I forget his precepts and example, may my guardian angel forget me!"

"Happy, glorious Thaddeus!" cried I, grasping his hand, "how I envy your destiny! To live as you do in the lap of honour; virtue and glory the aim and end of your existence!"

"The animated countenance of my friend changed at these words, and laying his hand on my arm, he said, "Do not envy my destiny; Pembroke, you are the citizen of a free country, at peace with itself. Insatiate power has not dared to invade its rights. Your king, in happy security, reigns in the hearts of his people; whilst our anointed Stanislaus, is baited and insulted by oppression from without, and ingratitude within. Do not envy me! I would rather live in obscurity all my days, than have the means which I have of acquiring celebrity over the ruins of Poland. Oh! my friend, the wreath that crowns the head of conquest is thick and bright; but that which binds the olive of peace on the bleeding wounds of my country, will be dearest to me."

"Such sentiments as these, my dear madam, have opened new lights upon my poor mistaken faculties. I had not considered the subject so maturely as my friend; victory and glory were with me synonymous words; I had not learnt till frequent conversations with the young and ardent Sobieski taught me, how to discriminate between ferocity and valour; between the patriot and the assassin; between the defender of his country, and the ravager of other states. In short, I see in Thaddeus Sobieski all that my fancy hath ever pictured of the heroic character. Whilst I contemplate the sublimity of his nature, and the tenderness of his soul, I cannot help thinking, how few would believe that all these amia qualities could belong to one mind, and it remain unacquain alike with the throes of ambition, and the taints of vani

Pembroke judged rightly of his friend: for if ever disinterested amor patria glowed in the breast of man, it mated the heart of the young Sobieski. Pembroke had down his pen at the termination of the foregoing sentenc the letter to his mother, on the entrance of a servant who sented him with a packet which had that moment arrived f Petersburgh. He took it, and laying his writing mate back into the desk, read the following epistle from governor:

"To Pembroke Somerset, Esq.

"My dear sir,

"I have this day received your letter, enclosing one Lady Somerset. You must pardon me that I have deta it, and will continue to do so, till I am favoured with answer to this, for which I shall most anxiously wait.

"You know, Mr. Somerset, my reputation in the scien you know my depth in the languages; and, besides, Marquis of Iverary, with whom I travelled all over the c nent, offered you sufficient credentials respecting my kn ledge of the world, and the honourable manner in whi treat my pupils. Sir Robert Somerset and your L mother, were amply satisfied with the account which his ship gave of my character; but with all this, in one every man is vulnerable. No scholar can forget those of the poet.

Felices ter, et amplius,
Quos irrupta tenet copula; nec malis
Divulsus quærimoniis Suprema citius solvet amor die.

It has been my misfortune that I have felt them.

"You are not ignorant that I was known in the Bri family, when I had the honour of conducting the Ma through Russia. The Count's accomplished kinswoman amiable and learned widow of the Baron Surowkoff, then took particular notice of me; and when I returned you to Petersburgh, I did not find that my short absence obliterated me from her memory.

"You are well acquainted with the dignity of that lady's opinions on political subjects; she and I coincide in ardour for the cause of insulted Russia, and in hatred of that levelling power which pervades all Europe. Many have been the long and interesting conversations we have held on the prosecution of those schemes, which her late husband had so principal a hand in laying, for the subversion of that miserable kingdom in which you now are.

"The baroness, I need not observe, is as handsome as she is ingenious; her understanding is as masculine as her person is lovely; and I had been more or less than man, if I had not understood that my figure and talents were agreeable to her. I cannot say that she has absolutely promised me her hand, but she has gone as far that way, as delicacy would permit. I am thus circumstantial, Mr. Somerset, to show you that I never proceed without proof. She has repeatedly said in my presence, that she would never marry any man, unless he were not only well-looking, but of the profoundest erudition, united with an acquaintance with men and manners, which none could dispute. "Besides," added she, "he must not differ with me one tittle in politics, for on that head I hold myself second to no man nor woman in Europe." And then she has complimented me, by declaring, that I possessed the most judicious sentiments in government she had ever met with; that she should consider herself happy, on the first vacancy, to introduce me at court, where she was sure the empress would at once discover the value of my talents; "but," she continued, "in such a case, I will not allow that even her majesty shall rival me in your esteem." The modesty natural to my character, told me that these praises must have some other source than my comparatively unequal abilities; and I unequivocally found it, in the partiality with which her ladyship had condescended to regard me.

"Was I to blame, Mr. Somerset? Would not any man of sensibility and honour have immediately comprehended such advances from a woman of her rank and reputation? I could not be mistaken; her looks and words needed no explanation which my judgment could not pronounce. Though I am aware that I do not possess that lumen purpureum juventæ, which attracts every young uneducated woman, yet I am not fifty; and from the baroness' singular behaviour, I had every reason to expect handsomer treatment than she has been pleased to dispense to me since my return.

"But to proceed regularly; (I must beg your pardon for the warmth which has carried me to this digression know, sir, that from the hour in which I had the ho taking leave of your noble family in England, I st impress upon your rather volatile mind, a just and a conception of the people among whom I was to condu

When I brought you into this extensive empire, I left n of mine unexerted, to heighten your respect, not only amiable sovereign, but for all regal powers. It is the p of genius to be zealous: I was so in favour of the pret of the great Catharine to that paltry country, to wh has deigned to offer her protection. To this zeal, a unfortunate, though honourable devotion, to the wishe baroness, I am constrained to date my present dilemm

"When Poland had the insolence to rebel against it trious mistress, you remember that every man in Pete was highly incensed. The Baroness Surowkoff decla self frequently and with vehemence; she appealed my veracity and my principles were called forth, an fessed that I thought every friend to the Czarina o take up arms against that ungrateful people. The Brinicki was then appointed to the command of the forces; and her ladyship, very unexpectedly on m answered me by approving what I said; and saying, course I meant to follow her cousin into Poland; for th
she, as a woman, was so earnest in the cause, that sh accompany him to the frontiers, and there wait the re

"What could I do? How could I withstand the e tions of a lady of her quality, and one whom I believe me? However, some time I did oppose my wish to obl
I urged my cloth, and how I should be able to account a line of conduct to the father of my pupil? The h ridiculed all these arguments as mere excuses; and end saying, 'Do as you please, Mr. Loftus. I have been d in your character; the friend of the Baroness Surowk be consistent; he must be as willing to fight for the c espouses as to speak for it; in this case, the swor follow the oration, else we shall see Poland in the han rabble.'

"This decided me. I offered my services to the co attend him to the field. He, and the young lords pe you to do the same; and as I could not think of leavi when your father had placed you under my charge pleased to find that my approval confirmed your wish soldier. I was then unacquainted, Mr. Somerset, (for not tell me of it till we were far advanced into Poland,) with Sir Robert's and my lady's dislike of the army. This has been a prime source of my error, and had I known their repugnance to your taking up arms, I believe that my duty would have triumphed even over my devotion to the baroness; but I have been born under a melancholy horoscope; nothing happens as any of my humblest wishes might warrant.

"At the first onset of the battle, I became so suddenly ill, that I was obliged to retire, or swoon upon the ground; and on this unfortunate event, which was completely unwielded on my part, (for no man can command the period of sickness,) the Baroness has founded a contempt which has disconcerted all my schemes. Besides, when I attempted to remonstrate with her ladyship on the promise, which, if not directly given, was implied, she laughed at me; and when I persisted, all at once, like the rest of her ungrateful, undistinguishing sex, she burst into a thousand invectives, and forbade me her house.

"What am I now to do, Mr. Somerset? This inconsistent woman has betrayed me into conduct diametrically opposite to the commands of your family. Your father particularly desired that I would not suffer you to go either into Hungary or Poland. In the last instance I have permitted you to disobey him. And my Lady Somerset, who lost both her father and brother in different engagements, you tell me, had declared, that she would never pardon the man who should put military ideas into your head.

"Therefore, sir, though you are my pupil, I throw myself on your generosity. If you persist in acquainting your family with the late transactions of Zielime, and your present residence in Poland, I shall finally be ruined. I shall not only forfeit the good opinion of your father and mother, but through their means, lose all prospect of any establishment in the rich living of Somerset, which Sir Robert was so gracious as to promise me, on the demise of the present incumbent. You know, Mr. Somerset, that I have a mother and six sisters in Wales, whose entire support depends on my success in life; if my promotion be stopped now, they must necessarily be involved in a distress that makes me shudder.

"I cannot add more, sir; I know your generosity; and I therefore rest upon it. I shall detain the letter, which you did me the honour to enclose for my Lady Somerset, till I receive your decision; and ever whilst I live, shall I henceforth remain firm to my old and favourite maxim, which I ıve adopted from that glorious epistle of Horace to Numicius. erhaps you may not recollect the lines. They run thus:

Nil admirari, prope res est una, Numici.
Solaque, quæ possit facere and sware beatum.

"I have the honour to be,
"Dear sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"ANDREW LOFTUS.

"Petersburgh, September, 1792.

"P. S. Just as I was sealing this packet, the English mbassador forwarded me a short letter from your father, rherein he desires us to quit Russia immediately; and to nake the best of our way to England, where you are wanted n a most urgent occasion. He explains himself no further; nly repeating his orders in express commands, that we set off instantly. I therefore wait your directions."

The whole of this epistle very much disconcerted Mr. Somerset. He had always guessed that the Baroness Surowcoff was amusing herself with his vain and pedantic preceptor; but he had never entertained a suspicion that her ladyship would have carried her pleasantry to so cruel an excess. He saw clearly, that the fears of Mr. Loftus, with regard to the displeasure of his parents, were far from groundless; and therefore, as there was a probability from the age of Dr. Manners, who was upwards of eighty, and afflicted with the dropsy, that the rectory of Somerset would soon become vacant, he thought he had better oblige his poor governor, and preserve the secret for a month or two, than give him up to the chance of Sir Robert's indignation, which (he had reason to believe, from the resolution with which he carried through all his determinations) would not much favour the side of lenity. On these grounds, Pembroke resolved to write to Mr. Loftus, and ease the anxiety of his heart; although he ridiculed his vanity, he could not help feeling some compassion for the affectionate solicitude of a son and a brother; and as this last plea had won him, half angry, half grieved, and half laughing, he scribbled these hasty lines, which he immediately despatched by the courier.

"To the Rev. Andrew Loftus, Petersburgh.

"Upon my soul, sir, it is too bad! I am to burn my letters and go home! what can be the matter? what whimsical fit has seized my father, that I am recalled at a moment's notice? Faith I am so mad at it, and his not choosing to assign any reason, but that he 'desires me to make the best of my way to England,' that I do not know how I might be tempted to act.

"Another thing! you beg that I will not say a word of my ever having been in Poland; and for that purpose you have withheld the letter which I sent to you to forward to my mother. One cause of my being here, you say, was your 'ardour in the cause of insulted Russia; and your hatred of that levelling power which pervades all Europe.'

"Well, I grant it. I understood from you and Brinicki, that you were leading me to march against a set of violent, discontented men of rank, who, in proportion as they were inflated with personal pride and insolence, despised their own order; and under the name of freedom were introducing anarchy throughout the country which Catharine would have graciously protected. All this I find is false. But you both may have been misled; the Count, by interest; and you, by misrepresentation; therefore, I do not perceive why you should be in such a terror. The wisest man in the world may see through bad lights; and why should you think that my father would never pardon your having been so unlucky?

"Yet, to satisfy your dread of such tidings ruining you with Sir Robert, I will not be the first to tell him of our quixoting. Only remember, my good sir, though to oblige you, I withhold all my letters to my mother, and when I arrive in England, shall lock up my lips from mentioning Poland, yet, positively, I will not be mute one day longer than that in which my father presents you with the living of Somerset; then you will be independent of his displeasure; and I may and will declare my everlasting gratitude to this illustrious family.

"Heigho! I am half crazy when I think of leaving them. I must tear myself from this heaven on earth! The days have passed with me as minutes. Alas, alas! that I quit this mansion of comfort and affection, to wander with you, in some rumbling old coach, 'over brake and through brier!' Well patience! Another such a drubbing given to my quandom friends the Russians, and with 'victory perched like an eagle on their laurelled brows,' I may have some chance of wooing the Sobieskies to the banks of the Thames. At present I have not sufficient patience to keep me in good humour.

"Meet me this day week at Dantzic: I shall there embark for England. You had better not bring any of the servants with you; they might blab; discharge them at Petersburgh, and hire others for yourself and me when you arrive at the seaport.

"I have the honour to remain,
"Dear sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"PEMBROKE SOMERSET.

"Villanow, September, 1792."

When Somerset joined his friends at supper, and imparted to them the commands of his father, an immediate change was produced on the spirits of the party. During the lamentations of the ladies, and the murmurs of the young men, the countess tried to dispel the effects of the information, by addressing Pembroke with a smile and saying, "But we shall hope that you have seen enough at Villanow, to tempt you back again at no very distant period. Tell Lady Somerset that you have left a second mother in Poland, who will long to receive another visit from her adopted son."

"Yes, my dear madam," returned he, "and I shall hope before a very distant period, to see two kind mothers, united as intimately by friendship, as they are now in my heart."

Thaddeus listened to all this with a saddened countenance. He had not been much accustomed to disappointment, and his feelings, when disturbed, hardly knew how to proportion the uneasiness to the privation. Hope, and all the hilarities of youth flourished in his soul; his features continually glowed with animation, while the gay beaming of his eyes ever answered to the smile on his lips. Hence, the slightest veering on his mind was perceptible to the countess, who, turning round, saw him leaning back in the chair, with his arms folded, and his colour heightened, whilst Pembroke, with greater force and vociferation, was running through various invectives against the hastiness of his recall.

"Come, come, Thaddeus," cried he, and parting the thick approaching curl on his forehead, "let us think no more of this separation till it arrives. You know that anticipation of evil is the death of happiness; and now it will be a kind of suicide, should we destroy the hours which we may yet enjoy together, in vain complainings that they are too soon to terminate."

A little more exhortation from the countess, and a maternal kiss, which she imprinted on his cheek, restored him to cheerfulness; and the evening passed away pleasanter than it had portended.

Much as the palatine esteemed Pembroke Somerset, his mind was too deeply absorbed in the losses of his country to attend to less considerable cares. He beheld the republic on the verge of destruction, with firmness and indignation, awaiting the earthquake which was to ingulph it in the neighbouring nations. He saw the storm approaching; but he determined, whilst there remained even one spot of vantage ground above the general wreck, that Poland should yet have a name and a defender. These thoughts possessed him, these plans engaged him; and he had not leisure to regret pleasure when he was struggling for existence.

The empress continued to pour her armies into the heart of the kingdom. The king of Prussia boldly flying from his treaties, refused his succour; and the emperor of Germany, following the example of so great a prince, did not blush to show that his word was equally contemptible.

Whilst the Russians were making their advances with sword and rapine, Frederick openly avowed his designs to be in concert with Petersburgh; and Poland accordingly was attacked on every quarter. Continual despatches arrived, that the villages were laid waste; that neither age, nor sex, nor situation, prevented their unfortunate inhabitants from becoming the victims of cruelty; and that all the frontier provinces were in flames.

The Diet was called, and the debates agitated with all the anxiety of men who are met to decide on their dearest interests. The feelings of the benevolent Stanislaus bled at the dreadful picture of his people's sufferings; and hardly able to restrain his tears, he answered the animated exordiums of Sobieski for resistence to the last, with an appeal immediately to his heart.

"What is it you urge to do, my lord?" said he. "Was it not to secure the happiness of my subjects that I laboured? and finding that impracticable, what advantage would it be to them, should I pertinaciously oppose their small numbers against the accumulated hordes of the north? What is my kingdom but the comfort of my people? What will it avail me, to see them fall around me, man by man, and the few

that remain, hanging in speechless sorrow over their gra
Such a sight would break my heart. Poland, withou people, would be a desert; and I, rather a hermit than a k

In vain the palatine combated this argument, and the that a peace would now afford, by declaring it could onl temporary. In vain he told his majesty, that he would chase safety for the present race, at the vast expense, o only the liberty of posterity, but of its probity and happi

"However you disguise slavery," cried he, "it is sla still. Its chains, though wreathed with roses, not only f on the body, but rivet on the mind. They bend it from proudest virtue, to a debasement beneath calculation. disgrace honour; they trample upon justice. They trans the legions of Rome into a band of singers. They pros the sons of Athens and of Sparta at the feet of cowards.
make man abjure his birthright, bind himself to another's and give that into a tyrant's hands, which he received deposit from heaven, his reason, his conscience, and his Think on this, and then, if you can, subjugate Poland t enemies."

Stanislaus, weakened by years, and impelled by disapp
ment, now only wished to save his subjects from imme outrage. He returned no answer, but with streaming bent over the table, and annulled the glorious constituti 1791; then, with emotions hardly short of agony, he si
the order presented by the Russian officer, which dir prince Poniatowski to deliver the army under his comm into the hands of general Brinicki.

As the king put his signature to these papers, Sob who had so strenuously withstood each design, started his chair, bowed to his sovereign, and in silence left the a ment. Prince Sapieha, and several other noblemen foll him.

These pacific measures did not meet with better treat from without. When they were noised abroad, an alar commotion arose among the inhabitants of Warsaw; nearly four thousand men, of the first families in the rep assembled themselves in the park of Villanow, where immediately resolved, that if necessary, they alone v resist the power of their combined ravagers to the utter The prince Sapieha, Kosciuszko, and Sobieski, were the who took the oath of eternal fidelity to Poland; and administered to Thaddeus, who kneeling down, calle given to hear him, as he swore to assert the freedom of his country to the last gasp of its existence.

In the midst of these momemtous affairs, Pembroke Somerset bade adieu to his friends; and set sail with his governor from Dantzic for England.

CHAPTER V.

Those winter months, which before this year had been at Villanow the season for cheerfulness and festivity, now rolled away in the sad pomp of national debates and military assemblies.

Prussia usurped the best part of Pomerelia, and garrisoned it with troops; Catharine declared her dominion over the vast tract of land that lies between the Dwina and Boryestenes; and Frederick William marked down another sweep of Poland, to follow the fate of Dantzic and Thorn.

Calamities, and insults, and robberies, were heaped, day after day, on the defenceless Poles. The deputies of the province were put in prison; and the Russian ambassador had the insolence even to intercept provisions for the king's table, and appropriate them to his own. Sobieski remonstrated with his excellency on this outrage, who incensed at the reproof, and irritated at the sway which the palatine still held at court, ordered that his extensive estates in Lithuania and Podolia should be sequestered, and divided between four of the Russian generals.

In vain the Villanow confederation endeavoured to remonstrate with the empress. Her ambassador not only refused to forward the despatches, but threatened the nobles, that "if they did not comply with every one of his demands, he would lay all the estates, possessions, and habitations of the members of the Diet under an immediate military execution. Nay, punishment should not stop there, for should the king continue, (as he now appeared so much inclined) to join the Sobieski party, the royal domains should not only be treated with the same rigour, but some harsher means were already devised to bring them and their proud sovereign into subjection.

These menaces were of a nature too degrading to have any other effect on the Poles, than that of giving them a fresh spur to be resolute. With the same firmness they repulsed similar fulminations from the Prussian ambassador; and with a coldness that was only equalled by their intrepidity, they prepared to resume their arms.

The insolent Russian finding his threats unheeded, next morning surrounded the building where the confederation sat, with two battalions of grenadiers and four pieces of cannon: the disposition made, he issued orders, that no Pole should be permitted to go out, on pain of instant death. General Rautenfeld, with the officers of the division, were set over the person of the king, who was present; they declared they would not stir till his majesty and the Diet had given an unanimous consent to the full length of the empress' commands.

The Diet set forth the unlawfulness of signing any treaty, when they were thus held from the freedom of will and debate, by the presence of an intimidating force. They urged that it was not legal to enter into deliberation, when any violent act had recently been exerted against an individual of their body; and how could they do it now, when they were deprived of five of their principal members, whom the ambassador well knew he had ordered to be arrested in their way to the senate; Sobieski and four of his friends as the members most inimical to the wishes of Russia, were these five. In vain their liberation was required: Rautenfeld, enraged by the pertinacity of this opposition, repeated the former threatenings, with the addition of more, and declared that they should certainly take place, if the Diet did not, directly and unconditionally, sign the pretensions both of his court, and that of Prussia.

After a hard contention of many hours, the members at last agreed among themselves, to make a solemn public protest against the present tyrannous measures of the Russian ambassador; and, seeing that any attempt to inspire him even with decency was useless, they determined to cease all debate, and keep a profound silence, when the marshal should propose that project in demand.

This sorrowful silence was commenced in resentment, and retained through despair: this sorrowful silence was called by their usurpers, a consent; this sorrowful silence is held up to the world and to posterity, as a free cession of the Poles of all those rights which they received from nature, and defended with their blood.

The morning after this dreadful day the senate met at one of the private palaces, and indignant and broken hearted, delivered the following declaration to the people:

"The Diet of Poland, hemmed in by foreign troops, and menaced with an invasion from the Prussian army, which is to be attended with universal devastation and ruin; finally, insulted by a thousand outrages, have been forced to witness the signing of a treaty with Prussia.

"They did endeavour to have added to the treaty some conditions, to which they supposed the lamentable state of this country would have extorted an acquiescence even from the heart of power, but the Diet was deceived; they found the power unaccompanied by humanity; and that Prussia, having thrown his victim to the ground, would not refrain from enjoying the miserable satisfaction of trampling upon her neck.

"The Diet confides in the justice of Poland; confides in her belief, that they would not abandon the citadel which she has reposed in their keeping: her preservation is dearer to them than their lives; but fate seems to be on the side of their destroyer. Fresh insults have been heaped upon their heads, and new hardships have been imposed upon them. To prevent all deliberations on this debasing treaty, they are not only surrounded by foreign troops, and dared with hostile messages, but they have been violated by the arrest of their prime members, whilst those who are still suffered to possess a personal freedom, have the heaviest shackles laid upon their minds.

"Therefore, I, the king of Poland, enervated by age, and sinking under the accumulated weight of so many afflictions; and also, we, the members of the Diet, declare, that being unable, even by the sacrifice of our existence, to relieve our country from the yoke of its oppressors, consign it to posterity.

"In another age, means may one day be found, to rescue it from chains and misery; but such means are not in our power: other countries neglect us. Whilst they reprobate the violations which a neighbouring nation is alleged to have committed against rational liberty, they can see, not only with apathy, but with approbation, the ravages which are now desolating Poland. Posterity must avenge it; we have done. We accede, for the reason above mentioned, to the treaty laid before us, though we declare it to be contrary to our wishes, to our sentiments, and to our rights."

Thus, in November, 1793, compressed to one fourth of her dimensions, within the lines of demarcation drawn by her enemies, Poland was stripped of her rank in Europe; the lands of her nobles given to strangers, and her citizens left to st for want of bread. Ill fated nation! Posterity will weep thy wrongs; whilst the burning blush of shame that t fathers witnessed such wrongs unmoved, shall cause their ter tears to blister as they fall.

During these transactions, the Countess Sobieski conti in solitude at Villanow, awaiting with awful anxiety the mination of those portentous events, which so deeply invc her own comforts with those of her country. Her father in prison; her son at a distance with the army. Sick at h she saw the opening of that spring, which might only b commencement of a new season of injuries: and her were prophetic.

Those soldiers who had dared to retain their arms in hands, were again ordered by the Russian ambassador t them down. Some few, thinking denial vain, obeyed; those of bolder spirits followed Thaddeus Sobieski into Prussia, whence he had directed his steps immediately o arrest of his grandfather, and had gathered, and kept toge a handful of brave men, still faithful to their liberties. In his name alone had collected numbers around him in district through which he marched. Persecution from adversary, as well as admiration of Thaddeus, gave a resi power to his appearance, look, and voice; all which, had an effect on this afflicted people, that they crowded t standard by hundreds: whilst their lords, having caugh from the blazing ardour of the young Count, committed t selves, without reserve, to his sole judgment and comn The empress, hearing this, ordered Stanislaus to comm him directly to disband his troops: but the king refusing augmented the strength of her own forces; and enrag such stubborn resistance, renewed the war with redo horrors.

The palatine remained in confinement, hopeless of obta release without the aid of stratagem. The emissaries of arine were too well aware of his interest, to give freedom active an opponent; however, this patriotic victim to vi tive tyranny, received every consolation which a brave can feel, (his own arms being tied from serving his countr the information which he hourly learnt of his jailors, "th grandson was continuing to carry himself with such ins opposition in the south, that it would be well if the em at the termination of matters, allowed him to escape wi life." Every reproach which was levelled at the palati found was brought by some new conquest of Thaddeus; and instead of permitting their premeditated malice to take effect by intimidating his age or alarming his affection, he told the Russian officer, whose daily office it was to attend and torment him, that if his grandson were to lose his head for fidelity to Poland, he would almost as readily follow him to the scaffold, as witness him entering the streets of Warsaw with all Russia at his chariot wheels: "the only difference in my emotions would be;" continued Sobieski, "that as the first cannot happen till all virtue be dead in this land, I should feel his last gasp, as the last sign of that virtue which found a triumph even under the axe. For the second, it would be a joy unutterable to behold the victory of justice over rapine and murder! But, either way, he is still the same; ready to die, or ready to live for his country; and equally worthy of the eternal halo with which posterity will encircle his name."

Indeed the accounts which had arrived from this young soldier, who had lately formed a junction with general Kosciuszko, were in the highest degree formidable to the coalasced powers. They had gained a considerable advantage over the Prussians in several places, and were advancing towards Inowlotz, when a large and fresh body of the enemy appeared in their rear. The troops who were on the opposite bank of the river, whom the Poles were driving before them, on sight of this reinforcement, suddenly rallied; and as a mean of retarding the approach of their pursuers, and insuring their probable defeat from the army in view, they broke down the wooden bridge which might have brought them over. The Poles were for some time at a stand. Kosciuszko proposed swimming the river; but owing to the recent heavy rains, it was so swollen and rapid, that the young men to whom he mentioned it, terrified by the blackness and dashing of the water, drew back. The general perceiving their panic, called Thaddeus to him, and both together they plunged into the stream. The rest now ashamed of their hesitation, tried who could first follow this example; and after hard buffeting with the waves, the whole army gained the opposite shore. The Prussians in the rear, incapable of the like intrepidity, halted; and those in the van, intimidated by the dauntless courage of their adversaries, concealed themselves amidst the thickets of an adjoining valley.

The Poles proceeded towards Cracow, carrying redress and protection to the provinces through which they marched. But they had barely rested two days in that city, before despatches were received, that Warsaw was lying at the mercy of general Brinicki. No time could be lost; officers and men had set their lives in the cause, and recommenced their toils with a perseverance which brought them before the capital on the sixteenth of April.

Things were even in a worse state than Kosciuszko had expected. The Russian ambassador, with his usual arrogance, had demanded the surrender of the national arsenal, subscribing his orders with a threat, that whichever of the nobles should presume to dispute his authority, should be arrested and put to death; and as to the people, if they dared to murmur, he would immediately command general Brinicki to lay the city in ashes. None doubted the sincerity of this barbarian; for there were many in the senate who recollected, that when the nation was at war with them, two and thirty years before, nine Polish lords were sent into Warsaw with both hands lopped off; and that for this mutilation, they had to accuse the Russian general, who had acted the double part of judge and executioner. When the Poles remembered this instance of cruelty, which the court of Petersburgh had heard without condemning it, they could not anticipate any humanity for themselves.

The king remonstrated against these oppressions; and to "punish his presumption," this proper representative of the imperial Catharine, commanded that his majesty's garrison and guards should be instantly broken and dispersed. At the first attempt to execute this mandate, the people flew in crowds to the palace, and on their knees implored Stanislaus for permission to avenge the insult offered to his troops. His majesty looked at them with pity, gratitude, and anguish; at last, in a voice of agony that was wrung from his tortured heart, he answered, "Go and defend your honour!" The army of Kosciuszko marched into the town time enough to join the armed citizens; and that day, after a dreadful conflict, in which the streets were strewed with the killed, Warsaw was rescued from the immediate grasp of Russia. During the fight, the king, who was alone in one of the rooms of his palace, sunk almost fainting on the floor; he heard the mingling clash of arms, the roar of musketry, and the cries and groans of the combatants; ruin seemed no longer to hover over his kingdom, but to have pounced at once upon her prey. At every renewed shout which followed each pause in the firing, he expected the next moment to see his palace gates burst open, and himself, then indeed, made a willing sacrifice to the fury of his enemies.

Whilst he was yet upon his knees, petitioning the god of battle for a little farther respite from the last calamity which was doomed to overwhelm devoted Poland, Thaddeus Sobieski, panting with heat and toil, flew into the room, and before he could speak a word, was clasped in the arms of the agitated Stanislaus.

"Are my people safe?" asked the king.

"Yes, my liege," returned Thaddeus, "and victorious: The foreign guards are beaten from the palace; your own have resumed their station at the gates."

At this assurance, tears of joy ran over the venerable cheeks of his majesty; and again embracing his young deliverer, he said, "I thank heaven, that my unhappy country is not bereft of all hope. Whilst Kosciuszko, and a Sobieski live, she will not quite despair."

CHAPTER VI.

THADDEUS was not less eager to release his grandfather than he had been to relieve the anxiety of his sovereign. He hastened, at the head of a few troops, to the palace which was the prison of Sobieski, and gave him liberty, amidst the acclamations of his soldiers, who united in general demonstrations of joy at the sight of their veteran commander.

The universal gladness for these prosperous events, did not last for many days; it was speedily terminated by the information, that Cracow had surrendered to a Prussian force under general Van-Elsner; that the king of Prussia was advancing towards the capital; and the Russians, more implacable in consequence of the late treatment which their garrison had received at Warsaw, were pouring into the country like a deluge.

At this news the consternation became dreadful. The Polanese army, worn with fatigue and long services, were without clothing, ammunition, or in any way, except courage, fitted for the field.

The treasury was exhausted, and no means of raising a supply seemed practicable. The provinces were laid waste, and the city had been already drained of its last ducat. In this exigency, hopeless of devising any expedient for even a temporary succour, a council met in his majesty's private cabinet, to consult about obtaining resources. The debate was as desponding as their situation, till Thaddeus Sobieski, who had been a silent observer, rose from his seat; and whilst the blushes of awe and eagerness crimsoned his cheek, he advanced towards Stanislaus, and taking from his neck and other parts of his dress, those magnificent jewels which it was customary always to wear in the presence of the king, he knelt down, and laying them at the feet of his majesty, said in a suppressed voice, "These are trifles; but such as they are, and all of the like kind which I possess, I beseech your majesty to appropriate to the public service."

"Noble young man!" cried the king, lifting him from the ground, "you have indeed taught me a lesson: I accept these jewels with gratitude. Here," said he, turning to the treasurer, "put them into the national fund; and let them be followed by my own, with my plate, which I desire may be instantly sent to the mint. One half of it the army shall have; the other we must expend in giving some little support to the surviving families of those who have fallen in our defence."

The palatine, who thanked his grandson for his generous warmth, readily united with him in the surrender of all their personal property, for the benefit of their country. According to their example, the treasury was filled with gratuities from the nobles; and the army newly equipped, marched out in high spirits.

The Countess had a third time to bid adieu to a son, who was become as much the idol of her reason, as before he had been of her love. In proportion as glory surrounded him, and danger courted his steps, the strings of affection drew him closer to her soul; the "aspiring blood" of the Sobieskies, which beat in her veins, could not dull the feelings that she was a parent: that the spring of her existence now flowed from that fountain which had drawn its source from her. Her anxious and waiting heart paid dearly in tears and sleepless nights, for the honour with which she was saluted at every turning as the mother of Thaddeus; that Thaddeus, who was not more the soul of council and the sinew of war, than he was to her the gentlest, the dearest, the most amiable of sons. It matters little to the undistinguishing bolt of carnage, whether it strikes common breasts, or those rare hearts, whose course is usually as brief as it is dazzling; the leaden messenger of death banquets as sullenly on the bosom of a hero, as if it had lit upon more vulgar prey: all is levelled to the chance of war, which comes like a whirlwind of the desert, scattering man and beast in one wide ruin.

:h thoughts as these possessed the melancholy reveries
: Countess Sobieski, from the hour in which she saw deus and his grandfather depart for Cracow, until she it was retaken, and the enemy defeated in many battles.
arsaw was again bombarded; and again Kosciuszko,
the palatine and Thaddeus, preserved it from destruc-In short, wherever they moved, this dauntless little carried terror to their adversaries, and diffused hope g the homes and hearts of their countrymen.
ey next turned their course to the relief of Lithuania;
rhilst they were on their route thither, they received in-ence that a detachment from their body having been n by the Russians under Suworrow, that general, elated his success, was hastening forward to attack the capital.
sciuszko resolved to prevent him: and as a mean, he ised to give immediate battle to Ferfen, another comer, who was on his march to form a junction with the ious Russian. To this effect, Kosciuszko divided his ; half of them, under the command of Prince Ponia-
i, were to pursue Suworrow, and keep a watchful eye iis motions; whilst he with the remainder, to the amount
c thousand men, accompanied by the two Sobieskies, d proceed towards Brzesc.
was on the tenth of October. The weather being fine, a less sun diffused life and brilliancy through the pure air keen morning. The vast green plain before them glitwith the troops of general Ferfen, who had already ged them in order of battle.
e word was given. Thaddeus, as he drew his sabre its scabbard, raised his eyes, to implore the justice of n on that day's events. The attack was made. The kept their station on the heights. Twice the Russians d on them like wolves, and twice they repulsed them by steadiness. Conquest declared for Poland. Thaddeus een in every part of the field. But reinforcements pourto the support of Ferfen, and war raged in new horrors.
the courage of the Poles was unabated. Sobieski, fightt the head of the infantry, would not recede one foot; Kosciuszko, exhorting his men to be resolute, appeared hottest parts of the battle.
one of these portentous moments, Thaddeus saw the al struggling with his charger, which had been shot under he immediately galloped to his assistance, and giving nother, remained and fought by his side, till he beheld

two more horses share the same fate; and on his next charge, Kosciuszko himself dropped back on his saddle. Thaddeus caught him in his arms, and finding that a Cossac had stabbed him in the back, he unconsciously uttered a groan of dismay. The surrounding soldiers took the alarm, and "Kosciuszko, our general, is killed!" was echoed from rank to rank with such piercing shrieks, that the wounded hero opened his eyes, and was preparing to speak to his young friend, when two Russian chasseurs, in the same moment, made a cut at them both. The sabre struck the exposed head of Kosciuszko, who fell almost lifeless to the ground; and Thaddeus received a gash in his shoulder, which knocked him off his horse.

The conflict thickened over the fallen general: the consternation now became universal. for groans of despair seemed to issue from the whole army. Thaddeus with difficulty extricated himself from the bodies of the slain; and fighting his way through the throng of the enemy which pressed around him, he joined his terror-stricken comrades, who, in the wildest confusion, were dispersing under a heavy fire, to the right and left, and flying like frightened deer. In vain he called to them, in vain he urged them to avenge the fall of Kosciuszko; the panic was complete, and they fled.

Almost alone, in the rear of his soldiers, he opposed with his single and desperate arm, party after party of the enemy, till a narrow stream of Muschavez stopped his retreat. The waters were crimsoned with blood. He plunged in, and, beating the blushing wave with his left arm, in a few seconds gained the opposite bank: where, fainting from fatigue and loss of blood, he sunk, almost deprived of sense, amidst a heap of the killed.

When the pursuing squadrons had galloped by him, he again summoned strength to look around. He raised himself from the ground, and by the help of his sword, on which he leaned, supported his steps a few paces further, but, good God! what was the shock he received, when the bleeding and lifeless body of his grandfather lay before him! He stood for a few moments motionless, and without sensation; then kneeling down by his side, whilst his heart felt as if it were palsied with death, he searched for the wounds of the palatine. They were numerous and deep. He would have torn away the handkerchief with which he had staunched his own blood, to have applied it to that of his grandfather, but by so doing, he must have disabled himself from giving him further assistance; he took his sash and neckcloth, and when they were insufficient, he rent the linen from his breast; then hastening to the river, brought a little water in his cap, and threw some of its stained drops on the pale features of Sobieski. The venerable hero opened his eyes; in a minute afterwards he recognised that it was his grandson who knelt by him. The palatine pressed his hand, which was cold as ice: the marble lips of Thaddeus could not move.

"My son," said the veteran, in a low voice, "heaven hath led you here to receive the last sigh of your grandfather." Thaddeus trembled; the palatine continued, "Carry my blessing to your mother; and bid her seek comfort in the consolations of her God. May that God preserve you; ever remember that you are his servant; be obedient to him; and as I have been, be faithful to your country."

"May God so bless me!" cried Thaddeus, lifting his eyes to heaven.

"And ever remember," said the palatine, raising his head, which had dropped on the bosom of his grandson, "that you are a Sobieski! It is my dying command, you never take any other name."

"I promise."

Thaddeus could say no more, for the countenance of his grandfather became altered; his eyes closed; Thaddeus caught him on his breast. No heart beat against his; all was still and cold. The body dropped from his arms, and he sunk senseless by his side.

When sensation returned to him, he looked up. The sky was shrouded in clouds, which a driving wind was blowing from the orb of the moon, as a few of her white rays, here and there, gleamed on the weapons of the slaughtered soldiers.

The scattered senses of Thaddeus slowly recollected themselves. He was now lying the only living creature amidst thousands of the dead, who the preceding night had been, like himself, alive to all the consciousness of existence. His right hand rested on the chilled face of his grandfather; it was wet with dew; he shuddered; and taking his own cloak from his shoulders, laid it over the body. He would have said, as he did it, "So my father, I would have sheltered thy life with the sacrifice of my own;" but the words choked in his throat; and he sat watching by the corpse till the day dawned, and the Poles returned to bury their slain.

The wretched Thaddeus was discovered by a party of his own hussars, seated on a little mound of earth, with the cold hand of Sobieski grasped in his. At this sight, the soldiers uttered a cry of horror. Thaddeus rose up; "My friends," said he, "I thank God that you are come! Assist me to bear my dear grandfather to the camp."

Astonished at his composure, but distressed at the death-like hue of his countenance, they obeyed him in mournful silence, and laid the remains of the palatine upon a bier which they formed with their sheathed sabres, then gently raising it, they retrod their steps to the camp; having left a detachment to accomplish the duty for which they had quitted it. Thaddeus, hardly able to support his weakened frame, mounted a horse, and followed the melancholy procession.

General Wawrzecki, on whom the command had devolved, seeing the party return so soon, and in such an order, sent an aid-de-camp to inquire the reason. He came back with a dejection in his face, and informed the commander that the brave palatine of Masovia, whom they supposed had been taken prisoner with his grandson and Kosciuszko, had been killed, and was approaching the lines on the arms of his soldiers. Wawrzecki, though glad to hear that Thaddeus was alive and at liberty, turned round to conceal his tears; then calling out a guard, he marched at their head, to meet the corpse of his illustrious friend.

The bier was carried into the general's tent. An aid-de-camp, with some gentlemen of the faculty, were ordered to attend Thaddeus to his quarters; but the young Count, though scarcely able to stand, appeared to linger; and holding fast by the arm of an officer, he looked steadfastly on the body. Wawrzecki understood his hesitation. He pressed his hand; "Fear not, my dear sir," said he, "every honour shall be paid to the remains of your noble grandfather." Thaddeus bowed his head, and was supported out of the tent to his own.

His wounds, of which he had received several, were not deep; and might have been of little consequence, had not his thoughts continually hovered about his mother, and painted her afflictions, when she should be informed of the lamentable events of the last day's battle. These reflections, awake, or in a slumber, (for he never slept,) possessed his mind; and even while his wounds were healing, produced such an irritation in his blood as hourly threatened a fever.

Things were in this situation when the surgeon, with a hesitating countenance, put a letter from the Countess into his hand. He opened it, and read with breathless anxiety, these lines:

"To Thaddeus, Count Sobieski.

"Console yourself, my most precious son, console yourself for my sake. I have seen Colonel Lomza, and I have heard all the horrors which took place on the tenth of this month. I have heard them, and I am yet alive: I am resigned: but he tells me that you are wounded. Oh! do not let me be also bereft of my son! Remember, that you were my dear sainted father's darling; remember, that as his representative, you are to be my consolation; in pity to me, if not to our suffering country, preserve yourself, to be at least the last comfort that heaven will spare to me. I find that all is lost to Poland, as well as to myself; that when my glorious father fell, and his friend with him, the republic became extinct. The Russian army is now on its march towards Masovia; and I am too weak to come to you. Let me see you soon, very soon, my beloved son; I beseech you, come to me! You will find me more feeble of body than of mind; for there is a holy comforter that descends on the bruised heart, which none other than the unhappy have conceived or felt. Farewell my dear, dear Thaddeus! Let the memory that you have a mother check your too ardent courage. God for ever guard you. Live for your mother, who has no stronger terms of expressing her affection for you, than that she is thy mother, thy

"Therese Sobieski,

"Villanow, October, 1794."

This letter was indeed a balm to the soul of Thaddeus. That his adored mother had received the cruel event with such resignation, was the best medicine which could now be applied to his wounds, both of mind and body; and when he was told, that on the succeeding morning the body of his grandfather should be removed to the convent, near Biala, declared his resolution to attend it to the grave.

In vain his surgeons and General Wawrzecki remonstrated against the danger of this project; for once the gentle and yielding spirit of Thaddeus seemed inexorable. He had fixed his determination, and it was not to be shaken.

Next day, being the seventh from that in which the fatal battle had been decided, Thaddeus, at the first beat of the drum, rose from his bed, and, almost unassisted, put on his clothes. His uniform being black, he needed no other index than his pale and mournful countenance, to announce that he was chief mourner.

The procession began to form, and he walked from his tent. It was a fine morning: Thaddeus looked up, as if to upbraid the sun for shining so brightly. Lengthened and repeated rounds of cannon rolled along the air. The solemn march of the dead was moaning from the muffled drum, interrupted at measured pauses by the shrill tremor of the fife. The troops, preceded by their general, moved forward with a decent and melancholy step. The bishop of Warsaw followed, bearing the sacred volume in his hand; and next, borne upon the crossed pikes of his soldiers, and supported by twelve of his most veteran companions, appeared the body of the brave Sobieski. A velvet pall covered it, on which were laid those arms with which, for fifty years, he had asserted the liberties of his country. At this sight, the sobs of the men became audible. Thaddeus followed with a slow, firm step, his eyes bent to the ground, and his arms wrapped in his cloak: it was the same which had shaded his beloved grandfather from the dews of that dreadful night. Another train of solemn music succeeded; and then the squadrons which the deceased had commanded, dismounted, and leading their horses, closed the procession.

On the verge of the plain that borders Biala, and within a few paces of the convent gate of St. Francis, the bier stopped. The monks saluted its appearance with a requiem which they continued to chant till the coffin was lowered into the ground. The earth received the sacred deposit. The anthems ceased; the soldiers kneeling down, discharged their musketry over it; then with streaming cheeks, rose, and gave place to others. Nine vollies were fired, and the ranks fell back. The bishop advanced to the head of the grave: all was hushed; he raised his eyes to heaven, then, after a pause, in which he seemed to be communing with the regions above him, he turned to the silent assembly, and in a voice collected and impressive, addressed them in a short, but affecting oration, in which he set forth the brightness of Sobieski's life; his noble forgetfulness of self, in the interest of his country; and the dauntless bravery which had laid him in the tomb. A general discharge of cannon and musketry was the awful response to this appeal. Wawrzecki took the sword of the palatine, and breaking it, dropped it into the grave. The aids-de-camp of the deceased did the same by theirs, showing, that by so doing, they resigned their offices; and then, covering their faces with their handkerchiefs, they turned away with the soldiers who filed off. Thaddeus sunk on his knees; his hands were clasped, his eyes for a few minutes fixed themselves on the coffin of his grandfather; then rising, he leaned on the arm of Wawrzecki, and with a tottering step and pallid countenance, mounted his horse, which had been led to the spot, and returned with the scattered procession to the camp.

The cause for exertion being over, his spirits fell with the rapidity of a spring too highly wound up, which snaps, and runs down to perfect immobility. He entered his tent and threw himself on the bed, from which he did not arise during five days.

CHAPTER VII.

At a time when the effects of these sufferings and fatigues had brought him very low, the young Count Sobieski was aroused by the information that the Russians had already planted themselves before Prague, and were threatening to bombard the town. This news rallied the spirits of the depressed soldiers, who readily obeyed their commander, to put themselves in order to march the next day. Thaddeus felt that the decisive blow was pending; and though hardly able to sit on his horse, he refused the indulgence of a litter; determining, that no illness, however severe, should make him flag one hour from the active exercise of duty.

Devastation was spread over the face of the country. As the troops moved, the unhappy and houseless villagers presented an agonizing picture to their view. Old men stood among the ashes of their homes, deploring the cruelty of power; children and women sat by the way side, weeping over the last sustenance which the wretched infant drew from the breast of its perishing mother.

Thaddeus shut his eyes on the scene.

"O, my country! my country!" exclaimed he, "what are my personal griefs to thine? Nothing, nothing. It is your wretchedness that barbs me to the heart! Look there," cried he to his soldiers, pointing to the miserable spectacles before him, "look there, and carry vengeance into the breast of their destroyers. Let Prague be the last act of this tragedy."

Unhappy young man! unfortunate country! it was indeed the last act of a tragedy, to which all Europe were spectators; a tragedy which the nations witnessed, without one attempt to stop or delay its dreadful catastrophe! O! how must virtue be lost when it is no longer an article of policy even sume it.

After a long march, through a dark and dismal nigh morning began to break; and Thaddeus found himself Southern side of that little river, which divides the terr of Sobieski from the woods of Kobylka. Here, for th time, he endured all the torturing varieties of despair.

The once fertile fields were burnt to stubble; the co were yet smoking from the ravages of the fire; and in of smiling eyes and thankful lips, the dead bodies of the ants were stretched on the high roads, mangled, bleedin stripped of that decent covering which humanity woul even deny to guilt.

Thaddeus could bear the sight no longer; but setting to his horse, fled from the contemplation of scenes whic rowed up his heart.

At nightfall the army halted under the walls of Vill The Count looked towards the windows of the palac by the glare of light shining through the half drawn cu soon distinguished his mother's room. He then turned hi on that sweep of buildings appropriated to the palatine not one solitary lamp illuminated its gloom; the moon glimmered on the battlements, silvering the painted g the study window, where, with that beloved parent, he tately gazed upon the stars: and anticipated a cam which had so fatally terminated.

These thoughts, with his grief and his forebodings buried in the depths of his soul. Addressing General V zecki, he bade him welcome to Villanow; requesting same time, that the men might be directed to rest t morning; and that he, and the officers would partake freshments within the palace.

As soon as Thaddeus had seen guests seated at di tables in the eating hall, and given orders for the soldier served from the cellars, he withdrew to seek the Counte

He found her in her dressing room surrounded by her dants, who had just informed her of his arrival. The m he appeared at the door the women went out at an op passage, and Thaddeus, with an anguished heart, threw self on the bosom of his mother. They were silent fo time. Poignant reflection stopped their utterance, but n tears nor sighs filled up its place, until the Countess felt the full tide of maternal affections press upon he and mingle with her grief, raised her head upon her son's and said, whilst she strained him close in her arms, "Receive my thanks, O Father of mercy, that thou hast yet spared to me this blessing!"

Sobieski breathed a response to the address of his mother; and drying her tears with his kisses, dwelt upon the never dying fame of his beloved grandfather; upon his preferable lot to that of their brave friend Kosciuszko, who was doomed not only to survive the liberty of his country, but to pass the residue of his life within the dungeons of a Russian prison. He then tried to reanimate her spirits with hope. He spoke of the approaching battle, without expressing any doubt of the valour and desperation of the Poles rendering it successful. He talked of the firmness of the king, of the courage of the general, of his own resolution. His discourse began in a wish to cheat her into tranquillity, but as he advanced on the subject, his soul took fire at its own warmth, and he half believed the probability of his anticipations.

The Countess looked on the honourable glow that crimsoned his harrassed features, with a pang at her heart.

"My heroic son!" cried she, "my darling Thaddeus! what a vast price do I pay for all this excellence! I could not love you were you otherwise than what you are; and being what you are, O! how soon may I lose you! Already has your noble grandfather paid the debt that he owed to his glory; he promised to fall with Poland; he has kept his word; and now, all that I love on earth is concentrated in you." The Countess paused, and pressing his hand almost wildly on her heart, she continued, in a hurried voice, "The same spirit is in your breast; the same principle binds you; and I may at last be left alone. Heaven have pity on me!"

She cast her eyes upwards as she ended. Thaddeus, sinking on his knees by her side, implored her with all the earnestness of piety and confidence, to take comfort. Her ladyship embraced him with a forced smile, and said, "You must forgive me, Thaddeus: I have nothing of the soldier in my heart; it is all woman. But I will not detain you longer, my dear boy, from that rest which you require; go to your room, and try to recruit yourself for the fatigues which I expect to-morrow will bring forth."

Sobieski, consoled to see any composure in his mother, withdrew; and after having heard that his numerous guests were properly lodged, went to his own chamber.

Next morning at sun-rise, the troops prepared to march. General Wawrzecki, with his officers, begged permission to pay their personal gratitude to the Countess, for the hospitality of their reception; she declined that honour on the plea of indisposition; and in the course of an hour, the Count appeared from her apartment, and joined the general; his cheeks were flushed with the struggles of parting; and he was so shaken by emotion, that his steps were irregular, and his manner confused, till he entered the court-yard.

The soldiers filed off through the gates, crossed the bridge, and halted under the walls of Prague. The lines of the camp were drawn and fortified before the evening; when they found full leisure to observe the enemy's strength.

Russia seemed to have exhausted her wide regions to people the narrow shores of the Vistula: from the east to the west as far as the eye could reach, her armies were stretched to the horizon. Sobieski looked at them, and then on the handful of dauntless hearts contained in the small circumference of the Polish camp, and sighing heavily, retired into his tent, where he mixed his short and startled slumbers with frequent prayers for the preservation of these last victims of their country.

The hours appeared to stand still. Several times he rose from his bed and went to the door, to see whether the clouds were tinged with any appearance of dawn. All continued dark. He again returned into his marquee, and standing by the lamp, which was nearly exhausted, took out his watch and tried to distinguish the points; but finding that the light burnt too feebly, he was pressing the repeating spring, which struck five, when the report of a single musket made him start.

He flew to his tent door, and looking about him, saw that all in that quarter was at rest; then suspecting that it might be a signal of the enemy, he hurried towards the entrenchments, where he found the centinels in perfect security from any fears respecting the sound, as they supposed it to have proceeded from the town.

Sobieski paid little attention to their opinions, but ascending the nearest bastion to take a wider survey, in a few minutes he discerned, though obscurely, through the faint gleams of morning, the whole host of Russia, advancing in profound silence, towards the Polish lines. The instant he made this discovery, he came down, and lost no time in giving orders for a defence; then flying to other parts of the camp, he awakened the commander in chief, encouraged the men, and saw that the whole encampment was not only in motion, but prepared for the assault.

In consequence of these prompt arrangements, the Russians were received with the cross fire of the batteries, and case-shot and musketry from several redoubts, which raked their flanks as they approached: however, in defiance of this shower of bullets, they pressed on with an intrepidity worthy of a better cause, and overleaping the ditch by squadrons, entered the camp. A passage once secured, the Cossacs rushed in by thousands, and spreading themselves in front of the storming party, put every soul to the bayonet who opposed their way.

The Polish works gained, the Russians turned the cannon on its former masters; and as these rallied to the defence of what remained, swept them down by whole regiments. The noise of artillery thundered from all sides of the camp; the smoke was so great, that it was hardly possible to distinguish friends from foes; nevertheless, the spirits of the Poles flagged not a moment: as fast as one rampart was wrested from them, they threw themselves within another; which was as speedily taken by the help of hurdles, fascines, ladders, and a courage engendered by ferocity. Every spot of vantage ground was at length lost; and yet the Poles fought like lions; quarter was neither offered to them, nor required; they disputed every inch of way till they fell upon it in heaps; some lying before the parapets; others filling the ditches; and the rest, covering the ground for the enemy to tread on, as they cut their passage to the heart of the camp.

Sobieski, almost maddened by the scene, dripping with his own blood, and that of his brave friends, was seen in every part of the action; he was in the fosse, defending the trampled bodies of those who were dying; he was on the dyke animating the few who remained; Wawrzecki was slain, and every hope now hung on Thaddeus; his presence and voice infused new energy into the arms of his almost fainting countrymen; they kept close to his side, till the Russians, enraged at the dauntless intrepidity of this young hero, uttered the most unmanly imprecations, and rushing on his little phalanx, attacked them with redoubled numbers and fury.

Sobieski sustained the shock with firmness; but wherever he turned his eyes, they were blasted with some object which made them recoil; he beheld his companions and his soldiers strewing the earth, and their barbarous adversaries mounting their dying bodies as they hastened with loud huzzas to the destruction of Prague, whose gates were now burst open. His eyes grew dim at this sight; and at the very moment in which he tore them from spectacles so deadly to his heart, a Livonian officer struck him with a sabre, to all app dead upon the field.

When Thaddeus recovered from the blow, whicl lit on the steel of his cap, had only stunned him, h round, and found that all near him was quiet; but th different scene presented itself from the town. The cannon, and the bursting of bombs thundered, the ai ed livid and tremendous, by long spires of fire stream the burning houses, and mingling with the volumes which rolled from the guns. The dreadful tocsin, an of the victors, pierced the soul of the Count; springi the ground, he was preparing to rush forward to t when loud outcries of distress issued from the interi place; and a moment after, the grand magazine w up, with a horrible explosion.

In an instant the front of Prague was filled witl and children, flying in all directions, and rending the their shrieks. "Father Almighty!" cried Thadde ing his hands, "canst thou suffer this?" Whilst he y some straggling Cossacs from the town, who were about, glutted but not sated with blood, seized the p tives, and with a ferocity as wanton as unmanly, them at once from life and affliction.

This hideous spectacle brought his mother's defence before the eyes of Sobieski. Her palace was only f distant; and whilst the barbarous avidity of the I sparing n either age, nor sex, nor infancy, was too b gaged in sacking the place, to permit them to percei tary individual hurrying away amidst heaps of dea he flew across the few fields which intervened betwee and Villanow.

Thaddeus was met at the gate of the palace by gen zou, who had already learnt the fate of Prague noise and flames in that quarter; and anticipated t of some part of the victorious army before the walls now. When the Count crossed the drawbridge, he the worthy veteran had prepared every thing for a sistance; the ramparts were lined with soldiers, mounted with artillery.

"Here, my dear lord," cried he, as he led the Co the keep, "let the worst happen, here I am resolved t the possession of your grandfather's palace, till I h man to stand by me!"

Thaddeus strained him in silence to his breast; e amining the force, and giving further orders for more nding dispositions, he went to the apartments of his

Countess' women, who met him in the vestibule, begged be careful how he entered her ladyship's room; she had ly recovered from convulsions, into which she had been on hearing the cannonade against the Polish camp.
eus waited for no more; but regardless of their caution, pen the door of the chamber, and hastening up to his
's couch, cast himself into her arms. She clung round k; and for awhile, joy stopped her respiration, till g into a flood of tears, she wept over him, incapable of ing by words her tumultuous gratitude at again be-him alive. He looked on her altered and pallid fea-my mother," cried he, clasping her to his breast, "you and what will become of you?"

beloved son," replied she, kissing his forehead through ted blood which oozed from a cut above his temple, eloved son, before our cruel murderers can arrive, I ve found a refuge in the bosom of my God."
ldeus could only answer with a groan. She resumed, me your hand. I must not witness the grandson of i given up to despair: let your mother incite you to tion. You see I have not breathed a complaining word, h I behold you covered with wounds."
he spoke, she pointed to the sash and handkerchief vere bound round his thigh and left arm.
r separation will not be long; a few short years, per-urs, may unite us for ever in a better world."
Count was still speechless; he could only press her his lips. After pausing a moment, she proceeded:
ok up, my dear boy, and attend to me. Should Poland the property of other nations, I conjure you, if you its fall, to leave it. When reduced to slavery, it will er be an asylum for a man of honour. I beseech you, this happen, to go that very hour to England: that is ountry; and I have been told the people are kind to ortunate. Thaddeus! why do you delay to answer emember, these are your mother's dying prayers."
ill obey you."
en," continued she, taking out of her bosom a picture, e tie this round your neck. It is the portrait of your Thaddeus bent his head forward, and the Countess fastened it under his waistcoat. "Prize this gift, my child; it is likely to be all that you will now inherit either from me or your father. Try to forget his injustice, my dear son; and in memory of me, never part with it. O! Thaddeus, since the moment in which I first received it, till this instant, it has never been from my heart."

"And it shall never leave mine," answered he, in a stifled voice, "whilst I have a being."

The Countess was preparing to reply, when a sudden volley of firearms made Thaddeus spring upon his feet. Loud outcries succeeded. The women rushed into the apartment, screaming, "the ramparts are stormed!" and the next moment that quarter of the building rocked to its foundation. The Countess clung to the bosom of her son; Thaddeus clasped her close to his breast, and casting his petitioning eyes up to heaven, "O, my God!" cried he, "can I not find shelter for my mother?"

Another burst of cannon was followed by a heavy crash, and the most piercing shrieks were echoed through the palace. "All is lost!" cried a soldier, who appeared for an instant at the room door, and vanished.

Thaddeus, overwhelmed with despair, grasped his sword, which had fallen to the ground, and crying, "Mother, we will die together!" he would have given her one last and assuring embrace, when his eyes met the dreadful sight of her before anxious features, now tranquilized in death. She fell from his palsied arms back on the sofa, and he stood gazing on her as if struck by a power which had benumbed all his faculties.

The tumult in the palace increased every moment; but he heard it not, till Butzou, followed by two or three of his soldiers, ran into the apartment, calling out, "Count, save yourself!"

Sobieski still remained motionless. The general caught him by the arm, and throwing his mantle over the dead Countess, hurried him, almost unconscious, by an opposite door, through the state chambers into the gardens.

Thaddeus did not recover his recollection till he reached the outward gate; then breaking from the hold of his friend, was returning to the sorrowful scene he had left, when Butzou, aware of his intentions, just stopped him time enough to prevent his rushing on the bayonets of a party of Russian infantry, which was pursuing them at full speed.

The Count now rallied his distracted energies, and making a stand with the general and his three Poles, they compelled this merciless detachment to seek refuge among the arcades of the building.

Butzou would not allow his young lord to pursue these wretches; but hurried him across the park. He looked behind him: a long column of fire issued from the south towers. Thaddeus groaned. "All is indeed over!" and pressing his hand on his forehead, in that attitude followed the steps of the general towards the Vistula.

From the wind being very high, the flames spread itself over the roof of the palace, and catching at every combustible in its way, the Russians became so terrified at the quick progress of a fire which threatened to consume themselves as well as their rich plunder, that they quitted it with precipitation; and descrying the Count and his soldiers at a little distance, directed their malice to that point: speedily overtaking him, they blocked up the bridge by a file of men with fixed pikes, and not only menaced the Polanders as they advanced, but derided their means of defence.

Sobieski, indifferent alike to danger and to insults, stopped short to the left, and followed by his friends, plunged into the stream, amidst a shower of musket balls from the enemy. In a few minutes he reached the opposite bank; where he was assisted out of the river by some of the weeping inhabitants of Warsaw, who had been watching the expiring ashes of Prague, and the flames which were feeding on the boasted towers of Villanow.

Emerged from the waters, Thaddeus stood to regain his breath; and leaning on the shoulders of Butzou, he pointed to his burning palace, and said, with a smile of agony, "See what a funeral pile heaven has given to the manes of my dear mother!"

The general did not speak, for his emotions choked him; but motioning the two soldiers to proceed, he supported the Count into the citadel.

CHAPTER VIII.

From the termination of this sorrowful day, in which a brave and unhappy nation was consigned to slavery, Thaddeus had been confined to his apartment in the garrison.

It was now the latter end of November. General Butzou, supposing that the illness of his lord might continue some weeks, and feeling that no time ought to be lost, obtained his permission, and quitting Warsaw, joined prince Poniatowski, who was yet under arms, at the head of a few troops near Sachoryn.

Meanwhile, the Count Sobieski, finding himself tolerably restored, except in those wounds of the heart which only time can heal, was enabled to leave his room, and breathe a little fresh air on the ramparts.

His first appearance was greeted by the officers with melancholy congratulations; but their replies soon displaced the faint smile which he tried to spread over his countenance; and with a contracted brow, he listened to the following information:

Prague had not only been razed to the ground, but upwards of thirty thousand persons, besides old men, women, and defenceless infants, had either perished by the sword, or had been cast into the river, or into the flames. All the horrors of Ismail had been reacted by Suworrow on the banks of the Vistula. The citizens of Warsaw, intimidated by such a spectacle, had assembled in a body, and, driven to desperation, repaired to the foot of the throne; on their knees they implored his majesty to forget the contested rights of his subjects; and in pity to their wives and children, allow them, by a timely submission, to save those dear relatives from the ignominy and cruelty which had been wreaked upon the inhabitants of Prague. Stanislaus saw that opposition would be fruitless; the walls of his capital were already surrounded by a train of artillery, prepared to blow them down to atoms on the first command of the Russian general; therefore, with a deep sigh, he assented to the petition, and sent deputies to the enemy's camp.

"And," continued the officer, "Suworrow, in reply, demands, that every man in Poland shall not only surrender his arms, but shall sue for pardon for the past; and these conditions are consented to."

"They never shall be by me," said Sobieski; and turning from his informer, he walked towards the royal palace, hardly knowing what were his intentions, or what he had else to hope or fear.

When his majesty was apprized that the young Count Sobieski awaited him in the audience chamber, he left his closet, where he had been musing alone, and entered the room. Thaddeus, with a swelling heart, would have thrown himself on his knees, but the king prevented him with emotion, and pressed him in his arms,

"Brave young man!" cried he, in a faltering voice, "I embrace in you the last of those Polish youths, who were so lately the brightest jewels in my crown."

Tears stood in the monarch's eyes as he spoke; and Sobieski, with hardly a steady utterance, answered, "I come to receive your majesty's commands. I will obey them in all things, but in surrendering this sword (which my grandfather bequeathed me) into the hands of your enemies."

"I will not desire you, my noble friend," replied Stanislaus; "by my acquiescence with the terms of Russia: I only comply with the earnest prayers of my people; I do not compel any. I shall not ask you to betray your country; but alas! you must not throw away your life in a now hopeless cause. Fate has consigned Poland to subjection; and when heaven, in its all wise, though mysterious decrees, confirms the destruction of kingdoms, man has no farther duty than resignation. For myself, I am ordered by our conqueror to bury my griefs and indignities in the castle of Grodno."

The blood rushed over the cheek of Thaddeus, at this meek declaration of his majesty, to which the proud indignation of his soul could in no way subscribe; with a heated and agitated voice, he exclaimed, "If my sovereign be already at the command of our oppressors, then, indeed, is Poland no more! and I have nothing to do but to perform the dying will of my mother. Will your majesty grant me permistion to set off for England, before I am obliged to witness this last calamity of my wretched country?"

"I would to heaven," replied the king, "that I too might repose my age and sorrows in that happy kingdom! Go, Sobieski, my prayers and blessings shall follow you."

Thaddeus pressed his majesty's hand to his lips.

"Believe me, my dear Count," continued Stanislaus, "my soul bleeds at this parting. I know the treasure which your family has always been to this nation; I know your own individual merit; I know the wealth which you have sacrificed for me and my subjects; and I am powerless to express my gratitude."

"Had I done any thing more than absolute duty," replied he, "such words from your majesty's lips would have been a reward adequate to every deprivation; but, alas, no! I have perhaps performed less than my duty; the blood of a Sobieski ought not to have been spared one drop, when the liberties of his country perished!" Thaddeus blushed while he spoke; and almost repented the too ready zeal of his friends in having saved him from the general slaughter at Villanow.

The voice of the venerable Stanislaus became fainter, as he resumed:

"Perhaps had a Sobieski reigned at this time, these horrors might not have been accomplished! That tyrannous power which has crushed my people, I cannot forget, was the same which put the sceptre into my hand. Catharine misunderstood my principles: she calculated on giving a traitor to the Poles: but when she made me a king, she could not obliterate that stamp that the KING of Kings had graven upon my heart: I believed myself to be his vicegerent; and, to the utmost I have struggled to fulfil my trust."

"Yes, my sovereign!" cried Thaddeus, "and whilst there remains one man on earth, who has drawn his first breath in Poland, he will bear witness in all the lands through which he may be doomed to wander, that he has felt from you the care and affection of a father. O! sir, how will future ages believe, that in the midst of civilized Europe, a brave people, and a virtuous monarch, were suffered unaided, undeplored, to fall into the grasp of usurpation and murder?"

Stanislaus laid his hand on the arm of the Count, and with a languid smile gleaming from his eyes, which still shed benign lustre through his gray locks, he said:

"Man's ambition and baseness are monstrous, only to the contemplation of youth. You are learning your lesson early: I have studied mine for many years; and with a bitterness of soul, which in some measure prepared me for the completion. My kingdom has passed from me at the moment you have lost your country. Before we part for ever, my dear Sobieski, take with you this assurance, that you have served the unfortunate Stanislaus, to the latest hour in which you beheld him; what you have just said, relative to the sentiments of those who were my subjects, is indeed a balm to my heart, and I will carry its consolation along with me to my prison."

The king paused; Sobieski, agitated and incapable of speaking, threw himself at his majesty's feet, and pressed his hand with fervency and anguish to his lips. The king looked down at his graceful figure; and pierced to the soul, by the more graceful feelings which dictated the action, the tear which stood in his eye-lid rolled over his cheek, and was followed by another before he could add, "Rise, my young friend, and take this ring: it contains my picture; wear it in remembrance of a man who loves you, and who never can forget your worth, or the loyalty and patriotism of your house."

The chancellor at that moment being announced, Thadrose from his knee, and was preparing to leave the room, i his majesty, perceiving his intention, desired him to ʃtay Count!" cried he, "I will burthen you with one re-

. I am now a king without a crown, without subjects, ɔut a foot of land to bury me when I die; I cannot rethe fidelity of even one of the few friends of whom my ies have not deprived me; but you are young, and hea-nay yet smile upon you in some distant nation. Will ɔay a debt of gratitude for your poor sovereign? Should
:ver again meet with the good old Butzou, who rescued
'hen my life lay on the fortune of a moment, remember, [regard him as the preserver of my existence! He was a private soldier in the Sobieski guards; and when I ɔd to recompense him by riches and honours, he only ɔd to remain with his first patron. I committed him to 'iendship of your grandfather, who immediately promo ıim to the rank of general over that battalion. This ɔ man, I was told this morning, directly on the destrucɔf Prague, joined the army of my brother; which being disbanded, with the rest of my faithful soldiers, he is forth in his old age on the bounty of a pitiless world.
ld you ever meet with him, Sobieski, succour him for ake."

\s heaven may succour me!" cried Thaddeus; and put his majesty's hand a second time to his lips, he bowed e chancellor, and passed into the street.

hen the Count returned to the citadel, he found that all as the king had represented. The soldiers in the gar-were reluctantly preparing to give up their arms; and ıobles, in compassion to the cries of the people, were ılly trying to humble their necks to the yoke of the ra-
r. The magistrates lingered as they went to take the keys from the hands of their good king, who had so fully protected them; and anticipated with bitter sighs, ıoment in which they should surrender them and their s into the power of Suworrow, and that "foul woman of orth," who exulted in nothing more than devastation.
ıland was now no place for Sobieski. He had survived is kindred. He had survived the liberties of his country, ıad beheld his king a prisoner; and his countrymen tramon by deceit and cruelty. As he walked on, musing over ɔ circumstances, he met with little interruption; for the ts appeared deserted. Here and there, a poor miserable wretch passed him, who seemed by his wan cheeks and haggard eyes, already to repent the too successful prayers of the deputation. The shops were shut. Thaddeus stopped a few minutes in the great square, which used to be crowded with the happy citizens, but not one man was now to be seen. An awful and expecting silence remained over all. He sighed, and walking down the east street, ascended that part of the ramparts which covered the Vistula.

He turned his eyes to the spot, where once stood the magnificent towers of his paternal palace.

"Yes," cried he, "it is now time for me to obey the last command of my mother! There is nothing remains of Poland but its soil! nothing of my home but its ashes!"

The Russians had pitched a detachment of tents amidst the ruins of Villanow; and were at this moment busying themselves in searching among the stupendous fragments, for what plunder the fire might have spared. Thaddeus gazed on the place for nearly an hour.

"Insatiate robbers!" exclaimed his tortured heart, his lips could only falter with emotion; "heaven will requite this sacrilege." He thought on the Countess, who lay beneath the ruins, and tore himself from the sight, whilst he added, "Farewell for ever; farewell thou beloved Villanow, in which I have spent so many blissful years! I quit you and my country for ever!" As he spoke, he raised his hands and eyes to heaven, and pressing the picture of his mother to his lips and bosom, turned from the parapet against which he had been leaning, and walked back to his chamber, determining to prepare that night for his departure the next morning.

He arose by daybreak, and having gathered together all his little wealth; which consisted merely of the hussar uniform that he wore, a few rings and pieces of gold, which he concealed with his linen in the portmanteau, that was buckled on his horse: precisely two hours before the triumphal car of general Suworrow entered Warsaw, Sobieski left it; bedewing its stones as he rode over the streets with his tears. They were the first that he had shed during the long series of his misfortunes; and they now flowed so fast from his eyes, that he could hardly discern his way out of the city.

At the great gate his horse stopped.

"Poor Saladin!" said Thaddeus, stroking his neck, "are you so sorry at leaving Warsaw, that like your unhappy master, you linger to take a last look?"

His tears redoubled; and the warden, as he opened the gate, and closed it after him, implored permission to kiss the hand of the noble Count Sobieski, before he turned his back to Poland, never to return. Thaddeus looked kindly round, and shaking hands with the honest man, after saying a few friendly words to him, rode on with a loitering step till he reached that part of the river which divides Masovia from the Prussian dominions.

Here he flung himself off his horse, and standing for a moment on the hill that rises near the bridge, retraced, with almost blinded eyes, the long and desolated lands through which he had passed: then involuntarily dropping on his knees, he plucked a turf of grass, and pressing it to his lips, exclaimed, "Farewell Poland! Farewell all my hopes of happiness!"

Almost stifled by his regrets, he put this poor relic of his country into his bosom; and remounting his horse, crossed the bridge.

As one, who, in flying from any particular object, thinks to lose himself and his sorrows when it lessens to his view, Sobieski pursued the remainder of his journey with a speed which soon brought him to Dantzic.

After having spent some days in this town, by the help of much mental exertion, he regained some firmness of mind. It was a calmness of feeling, arising from the conviction that his afflictions had gained their summit, and that however heavy they were, heaven had laid them on him, as a trial of faith and virtue. Under this belief he ceased to weep; but he never was seen to smile.

When he had entered into an agreement with the master of a vessel to carry him across the sea, he found, from calculating the strength of his finances, that they would barely defray the charges of the voyage. Considering these circumstances, it struck him how impossible it would be, to take his horse with him to England.

The first time this idea presented itself, it almost overset his new arranged philosophy. Tears would have started into his eyes, had he not by force withheld them.

"To part from my faithful Saladin," said he to himself, "that has borne me since I first could use a sword; that has carried me through so many dangers; and has even come with me into exile; it is painful, it is ungrateful!" He was in the stable when this thought assailed him; and as the reflections followed each other, he again turned to the stall: "But, my poor fellow, I will not barter your services for gold.

I will seek for some master who will be kind to you, in pity to my misfortunes."

He re-entered the hotel where he lodged, and calling a waiter, inquired who it was that occupied the fine mansion and park on the east of the town. The man replied: "a Mr. Hopetown, an eminent British merchant, who has been settled at Dantzic for near forty years."

"I am glad he is an Englishman!" was the sentiment which succeeded this information, in the Count's mind; who immediately taking his resolution, had hardly prepared to put it in execution, when he received a note from the captain, to be on board in half an hour, as the wind had set fair.

Thaddeus, rather disconcerted by this hasty call, with a depressed heart wrote the following letter:

"To JOHN HOPETOWN, ESQ.

"Sir—A Polish officer, who has sacrificed every thing but his honour to the last interests of his country, now addresses you.

"You are an Englishman: and to whom can a victim to the cause of freedom, with less debasement solicit an obligation.

"I cannot afford support to the horse which has carried me through the battles of this fatal war. I disdain to sell him: and therefore, I implore you, by the respect that you pay the memory of your ancestors, who struggled for, and obtained that liberty, in whose defence we are thus reduced! I implore you to give him an asylum in your park, and to protect him from injurious usage.

"Perform this benevolent action, sir, and you shall ever be remembered with gratitude by an unfortunate "POLANDER.

"Dantzic, November, 1794."

The Count having sealed and directed this letter, went into the hotel yard, and ordered that his horse might be brought out. These few days of rest had restored him to his former mettle, and he appeared from the stable prancing and pawing the earth as he used to do when Thaddeus was going to mount him for the field.

The groom was in vain striving to restrain the spirit of the horse, when the Count took hold of the bridle. The noble animal immediately knew his master, and became gentle as a lamb. After stroking him two or three times, with a bursting heart he returned the reins into the man's hand, and at the same time gave him the letter.

"There," said he, "take that note and the horse directly to the house of Mr. Hopetown. Leave them: for the letter requires no answer."

So saying, he walked out of the yard, towards the quay. The wind continued fair; he entered the ship; and, within an hour, set sail for England.

CHAPTER IX.

Sobieski passed the greater part of each day, and the whole of the night on the deck of the vessel. He was too much absorbed in himself to receive any amusement from the passengers, who, observing his melancholy, thought to disperse it by their everlasting company and conversation.

When any of those officious people came upon deck, he walked to the head of the ship, took his seat upon the cable which bound the anchor to the forecastle; and, while their fears rendered him safe from their attacks, by pondering with an aching heart upon what might be the consequence of his voyage, he gained some respite from vexation, though none from misery.

The ship having passed through the Baltic, and entered on the British sea, the passengers running from side to side of the vessel, pointed out to Thaddeus the distant shore of England, lying like a hazy ridge along the horizon; the happy people, whilst they strained their eyes through glasses, desired him to observe different spots in the hardly perceptible line, which they called Flamborough Head, and the hills of Yorkshire. He turned sick at all these objects of pleasure, for not one of them had a corresponding feeling in his breast. England could be nothing to him; if any thing, it would prove only a desert, which contained no one object for his regrets or wishes.

The image of Pembroke Somerset rose in his mind, like the dim recollection of one who has been a long time dead. Whilst he was with him at Villanow, he loved him warmly: and when they parted they promised to correspond. One day, in a pursuit of the enemy, Thaddeus had been so unlucky as to lose his friend's address, which was in his pocket book; but yet, uneasy at his silence, he had ventured two letters to him, directed merely to Sir Robert Somerset, England. To these he received no answer; and the palatine and Countess became so displeased with such neglect and ingratitude, that they would not suffer him to be mentioned in their presence; and indeed Thaddeus, from disappointment and regret, had no inclination to do so.

When the Count remembered these things, he found little comfort in recollecting the name of that young Englishman at this period; and now that he was visiting England rather as a poor exile, than as a powerful lord, half indignant, but more grieved, he almost gave up the wish with the hope of meeting Mr. Somerset. He felt that Somerset had not acted as the man must act, to whom he could apply in his distress; and he resolved, unfriended as he was, to think no more about him. With a bitter sigh he turned his back on the land to which he was going, and fixed his eyes on that tract of sea which divided him from all that had ever given him delight.

"Father of heaven," murmured he, in a suppressed voice, "what have I done to deserve this misery? Why have I been, at one stroke, deprived of all that rendered existence estimable? Two months ago I had a mother, a more than father, to love and cherish me: I had a country, that looked up to them and to myself with veneration and confidence: and now I am bereft of all; I have neither father, mother, nor country, but I am going to a land of strangers."

Such impatient adjurations were never wrung from Sobieski by the anguish of sudden torture, without his ingenuous and pious mind reproaching itself for repining. His soul was as soft as a woman's; but it knew neither effeminacy nor despair. Whilst his heart bled, his countenance retained its serenity. Whilst affliction crushed him to the earth, and nature paid a few hard wrung drops to her expected dissolution, he contemned his tears, and raised his fixed and confiding eye to that power which poured down its tempests on his head: Thaddeus felt as a man, but received consolation as a Christian.

When the ship arrived at the mouth of the Thames, the eagerness of the passengers increased to such an excess, that they would not stand still, nor be silent a moment; and when the vessel, under full sail, passed Sheerness, and the dome of St. Paul's appeared before them, their exclamations were loud and incessant. "My home! my parents! my wife! my friends!" were the burthen of every tongue.

Thaddeus found his irritable spirits again disturbed; and rising from his seat, he retired, unobserved by the people, who were too happy to attend to any thing foreign to their own transports. The cabin was as deserted as himself. Feeling that there is no solitude like that of the heart, when it looks around, and sees in the vast concourse of human beings, not one to whom it can pour forth its sorrows or receive the answering sigh of sympathy, he threw himself on one of the lockers, and with difficulty restrained the tears from gushing out of his eyes. He held his hand over them, and condemned himself for a weakness so unbecoming his character.

He despised himself: but let not others despise him. It is difficult for those who are in prosperity, who lie morning and evening in the lap of indulgence, to conceive the misery of being thrown out into a bleak and merciless world: it is impossible for the happy man, surrounded by luxury and gay companions, to figure to himself the reflections of a fellow creature, who has been fostered in the bosom of affection and elegance, cast at once from society, bereft of home, of comfort, of "of every stay, save innocence and heaven." None but the wretched can imagine what the wretched endure, from actual distress, from apprehended misfortune, from outraged feelings, and ten thousand nameless sensibilities to injury, which alone the unfortunate can conceive, dread, and experience.

Such were the anticipating fears of the Count. Books and report had led him to respect the English: Pembroke Somerset, at one time, would have taught him to love them: but the nearer he advanced towards the shore, the remembrance that it was from this country his father came; (an idea of whom never crossed him, that he did not banish it with horror;) this thought made him doubt the humanity of a people, of which his own parent, and forgetful friend, were so detestable a specimen.

The noise redoubled above his head; and in a few minutes afterwards, one of the sailors came rumbling down the stairs.

"Will it please your honour," said he, "to get up? That be my chest, and I want my clothes to clean myself before I go on shore; mother, I know, be waiting for me at Blackwall."

Thaddeus rose, and seeing that quiet was not to be found any where, ascended on the deck.

On coming up the hatchway, he saw that the ship had cast anchor in the midst of a large city, environed by myriads of vessels, from every quarter of the globe. Sobieski leaned over the railing, and in silence looked down on the other passengers, who were bearing off in boats, and shaking hands with the people that came to receive them.

"It is near dark, sir," said the captain, "mayhap you would like to go on shore? There is a boat just come round, and the tide won't serve much longer; and as your friends don't seem to be coming for you, you are welcome to a place in it with me."

The Count thanked him; and after defraying the expenses of the voyage, and giving half a guinea among the seamen, he desired that his portmanteau might be put into the wherry. The honest fellows, in gratitude to the bounty of their passenger, struggled who should obey his commands; when, during the contention and pulling at the baggage, the captain, angry at being detained, snatched it from between two of them, who in kindness to its master, were almost tugging it asunder, and flinging it into the boat, leaped in after it, and was followed by Thaddeus.

The taciturnity of the sailor, and the deep melancholy of his guest, did not break the silence till they had reached the Tower stairs.

"Go, Ben, fetch the gentleman a coach."

The Count bowed to the captain, who gave the order; and in a few minutes the boy came back with the intelligence that there was one in waiting; he took up the portmanteau, and Thaddeus followed him to the Tower gate, where the carriage stood. Ben threw in the baggage: the Count put his foot on the step.

"Where must the man drive to?"

Thaddeus drew it back again.

"Yes, sir," continued the lad, "where is your honour's home?"

"In my grave," was the response his aching heart made to this question. He hesitated before he spoke.

"A hotel," said he, flinging himself on the seat, and throwing some silver into the sailor's hat.

"What hotel, sir?" asked the coachman.

"Any."

The man closed the door, mounted his box, and drove off.

It was now near seven o'clock, of a dark December evening. The lamps were lit; and it being Saturday night, the streets were crowded with people. Thaddeus looked at them as he drove along: "Happy creatures!" thought he, "you have each a home to go to; you have each expecting friends to welcome you; every one of you know some fellow being in the world that will smile when you enter; whilst I, unhappy man! am insulated from every social comfort. Wretched, wretched Sobieski! where are now all thy highly prized treasures? thy boasted glory? and those beloved friends, who rendered that glory most precious to thee? Alas! all are withdrawn; vanished like a dream of enchantment, from which I have awakened to a frightful solitude."

His reflections were broken by the stopping of the carriage. The man opened the door.

"Sir, I have brought you to the Hummums, Covent Garden; it has as good accommodations as any in town. My fare is five shillings."

Thaddeus gave the demand, and followed him and his baggage into the coffee room. At the entrance of a man of his figure, several waiters presented themselves, begging to know his commands.

"I want a chamber."

He was immediately ushered into a very handsome dining room, where one of them laid down the portmanteau, and then bowing low, inquired whether he had dined.

The waiter having received his orders, (for the Count saw that it was necessary to call for something,) hastened into the kitchen to communicate them to the cook.

"Upon my soul, Betty," cried he, "you must do your best to-night, for the chicken is for the finest looking fellow you ever set your eyes on. By heaven, I believe him to be some Russian nobleman, perhaps the great Suworrow himself."

"A prince you mean, Jenkins," said a pretty girl who entered at that moment; "since I was born, I never see'd any English lord walk up and down a room with such an air; he looks like a king; for my part, I should not wonder if he is one of the emigrant kings, for they say there is a power of them now wandering about the world."

"You talk like a fool, Sally," cried the sapient waiter; "don't you see that his dress is military? Look at his black cap, with its long bag and great feather, and the monstrous sabre at his side; look at them, and then if you can, say I am mistaken in pronouncing that he is some commander in the Russian army, most likely come over as ambassador!"

"But he came in a hackney coach," cried a little dirty boy in the corner. "As I was running up stairs with coloured Leeson's shoes, I see'd the coachman bring in the portmanteau."

"Well, Jackanapes, what of that?" cried Jenkins; "is a nobleman always to carry his equipage about with him, like a snail with its shell on its back? To be sure, this Russian lord or prince is only come to stay here till his own house is fit for him. I will be civil to him."

"And so will I, Jenkins," rejoined Sally, smiling, "for I neve. see'd such handsome blue eyes in my born days; and they turned so sweet on me, and he spoke so kindly, when he bade me stir the fire: and when he sat down by it, and throwed off his great fur cloak, he showed a glittering star and a figure so noble, that, indeed cook, I do verily believe he is, as Jenkins says, an enthroned king."

"You and Jenkins be a pair of fools," cried the cook, who, without noticing that description, had been sulkily basting the fowl; "I will be sworn he's just such another king, as that palavering rogue was a French duke, who got my master's watch and pawned it! As for you, Sally, you had better be aware of hunting after foreign men folk; it's not seemly for a young woman, and you may chance to rue it."

The moralizing cook had now brought the whole kitchen on her shoulders. The men abused her for a surly old maid; and the women tittered whilst they seconded her censure, by cutting sly jokes on the blushing face of poor Sally, who stood almost crying by the side of her champion, Jenkins.

Whilst this hubbub was going forward below stairs, its unconscious subject was, as Sally had described, sitting in a chair, close to the fire, with his feet on the fender, his arms folded, and his eyes bent on the flames. He mused; but his ideas followed each other in such quick and confused succession, that it hardly could be said he thought of any thing.

The entrance of the dinner roused him from his reverie. It was carried in by at least half a dozen waiters. The Count had been so accustomed to a numerous suit of attendants, that he did not observe the parcelling out of his temperate meal; one bringing in the fowl, another the bread, his neighbour the solitary plate, and the rest in like order; so solicitous were the male listeners in the kitchen to see this wonderful Russian.

Thaddeus partook but lightly of the refreshment. Being already fatigued in body, and dizzy with the motion of the vessel, as soon as the cloth was withdrawn, he ordered a night candle, and desired to be shown to his chamber.

Jenkins, whom the sight of the embroidered star had confirmed in his decision that the foreigner must be a person of consequence, with increased agility whipped up the portmanteau, and led the way to the sleeping rooms. Here curiosity put on a new form; the women servants determined to have their wishes gratified as well as the men, had arranged themselves on each side of the passage through which the Count must pass. At so strange an appearance, Thaddeus drew back; but supposing it might be a custom of the country, he proceeded through this fair bevy, and bowed as he walked along, to the low curtesies which they continued to make, till he entered his apartment, and closed the door.

The unhappy are ever restless: they hope in every change of situation, to experience some alteration in their feelings. Thaddeus felt too miserable awake, not to view with eagerness the bed, whereon he trusted that, for a few hours at least, he might lose his consciousness of suffering with its remembrance.

When he awoke in the morning, his head ached, and he opened his eyes as unrefreshed as when he had lain down; he undrew the curtain, and saw from the strength of the light, that it must be mid-day. He got up, and having dressed himself, descended to the sitting room, where he found a good fire, and the breakfast things already placed; he rang the bell, and walked to the window to observe the appearance of the morning: a heavy snow had fallen during the night; and the sun, ascended to its meridian, shone through the thick atmosphere like a ball of fire; all seemed comfortless without, and turning back to the warm hearth that was blazing at the other end of the room, he was reseating himself, when Jenkins brought in the tea urn.

"I hope, my lord," said the waiter, "that your lordship slept well last night."

"Perfectly, I thank you," replied the Count, unmindful that the man had addressed him according to his rank; "when you come to remove these things, bring me my bill."

Jenkins bowed and withdrew, congratulating himself on his dexterity in having saluted the Russian nobleman according to his title. During the absence of the waiter, Thaddeus thought it time to examine the state of his purse: he well recollected how much he had paid at Dantzic; and from the style in which he was served here, he did not doubt but that to defray what he had contracted, would nearly exhaust his all. He emptied the contents of his pocket into his hand;

guinea and nineteen shillings were all that he possessed; a flush of terror suffused itself over his face; he had never known the want of money before, and he trembled now for fear the charge should exceed his means of payment.

Jenkins entered with the bill. On the Count's examining it, he was pleased to find, that it amounted to no more than the only piece of gold which his purse contained. He laid it down on the teaboard, and putting half a crown into the hand of Jenkins, who appeared to be waiting for something, wrapped his cloak round him, and was walking out of the room.

"I suppose, my lord," cried Jenkins, pocketing the money with a smirk, and bowing with the things in his hands, we are to have the honour of seeing your lordship again, as you leave your portmanteau behind you?"

Thaddeus hesitated a few seconds, then again moving towards the door, said, "I will send for it."

"By what name, my lord?"

"The Count Sobieski."

Jenkins immediately sat down the teaboard, and hurrying after Thaddeus along the passage and through the coffee-room, darted before him, and opening the door for him to go out, exclaimed loud enough for every body to hear, "Depend upon it, Count Sobieski, I will take care of your lordship's baggage."

Thaddeus, rather displeased at his noisy officiousness, only bent his head, and proceeded into the street.

The air was piercing cold; and on his looking around, he perceived by the disposition of the square in which he was, that it must be a market place. The booths and stands were covered with snow; whilst parts of the pavement were rendered nearly impassable, by the heaps of black ice which the market people the preceding day had shovelled up out of their way. He now recollected that it was Sunday, and consequently, the improbability of finding any lodgings on that day.

He stood under the piazzas for two or three minutes, bewildered on the plan he should adopt; to return to the hotel for any purpose but to sleep, in the present state of his finances, would be impossible; he therefore gave himself up, inclement as the season was, to walk about the streets till night; when he would go back to the Hummums to his bed chamber, and in the morning quit it for a residence more suitable to the reduction of his fortunes.

The wind blew a keen north east, with a violent shower of sleet and rain; yet such was the abstraction of his mind, that he hardly observed its bitterness, but walked on, careless whither his feet led him, till he stopped opposite to St. Martin's church.

"God is my only friend," said he to himself, "and in his house I shall surely find shelter."

He turned up the steps, and was entering the porch, when he met the congregation thronging out of it.

"Is the service over?" he inquired of a decent looking old woman, who was passing him down stairs. The woman started at this question asked her in English by a person whose dress was so completely that of a foreigner. He repeated it; and she smiling and curtesying, replied:

"Yes, sir, and I am sorry for it. Lord bless your handsome face, though you be a foreign gentleman, it does one's heart good to see you so devoutly given!"

Thaddeus blushed at this personal compliment, though it came from the lips of a wrinkled old woman, and begging permission to assist her down the stairs, he asked when service begun again.

"At three o'clock, sir, and may heaven bless the mother who bore so pious a son!"

As the poor woman spoke, she raised her eyes with a melancholy resignation. The Count, touched with her words and manner, almost unconscious to himself, continued by her side as she hobbled down the street.

His eyes were fixed on the ground, till, as he walked forward, somebody pressing against him, made him look round; he saw that his aged companion had just knocked at the door of a mean looking house, and that he and she were surrounded by near a dozen boys, who, through curiosity, had followed them from the church porch.

"Ah! sweet sir," cried she, "these folks are staring to see so fine a gentleman taking notice of age and poverty."

Thaddeus felt uneasy at the inquisitive gaze of some of the by-standers; and his companion observing it by the fluctuations of his countenance, added, as the door was opened by a little girl:

"Will your honour walk in out of the rain, and warm yourself by my poor fire?"

He hesitated a moment, then accepting her invitation, bent his head to get under the humble door-way, and following through a neatly sanded passage, entered a small but clean kitchen. A little boy who was sitting on a stool near the fire, uttered a scream at the sight of a stranger; and running up to his grandmother, rolled himself round in her cloak, crying out;

"Mammy, mammy, take away that black man!"

"Be quiet, William, it is a gentleman, and no black man. I am so ashamed, sir; but he is only three years old."

"I should apologize to you," returned the Count, smiling, "for introducing a person so hideous as to frighten your family."

By the time he finished speaking, the good dame had pacified the screaming child, who still stood trembling and looking askance at the tremendous black gentleman as he stroked the head of his pretty sister.

"Come here, my dear!" said Thaddeus, seating himself by the fire, and stretching out his hand to the child. It instantly buried its head in its grandmother's apron.

"William! William!" cried his sister, pulling him by the arm, "the gentleman will not hurt you."

The boy again lifted up his head. Thaddeus threw back his long sable cloak, and taking off his cap, whose hearse-like plumes he thought might have terrified the child, he laid it on the ground, and again stretching forth both his arms, called to the boy to come to him. Little William now looked steadfastly in his face, and then on the cap, which he had laid beside him: and then, whilst he grasped his grandmother's apron with one hand, he held out the other, half assured, towards the Count. Thaddeus immediately took it, and pressing it softly, pulled him gently to him, and placing him on his knee, "My little fellow," said he, kissing him, "you are not frightened now."

"No," said the child, "I see you are not the ugly black man that takes away naughty boys. The ugly black man has a black face, and snakes on his head: but these are pretty curls," added he, laughing, and putting his little fingers through the thick auburn hair which hung in neglected masses over the forehead of the Count.

"I am ashamed your honour should sit in a kitchen," rejoined the old lady, "but I have not a fire in any other room."

"Yes," said her grand-daughter, who was about twelve years old, "grandmother has a nice first floor up stairs; but because there be no lodgers, there be no fire there."

"Be silent, Nanny Robson," said the dame, "your pertness teases the gentleman."

"Oh, not at all," cried Thaddeus, "I ought to thank her, for she informs me that you have lodgings to let; will you allow me to engage them?"

"You sir," cried Mrs. Robson, thunderstruck, "for what purpose? Surely so noble a gentleman would not live in such a place as this."

"I would, Mrs. Robson; I know not where I could live with more comfort; and where comfort is, my good madam, what signifies the costliness or plainness of the dwelling."

"Well, sir, if you be indeed serious; but I cannot think you so; you are certainly making a joke of me, for my boldness in asking you into my poor house."

"Upon my honour I am not, Mrs. Robson. I would gladly be your lodger, if you will admit me; and to convince you that I am in earnest, my portmanteau shall this moment be brought here."

"Well, sir," resumed she, "I shall be honoured in having you in my house; but I have no room for any one besides yourself, not even for a servant."

"I have no servant."

"Then I will wait on him, grandmother," cried the little Nanny, "do let the gentleman have them, I am sure he looks honest."

The old woman coloured at this last observation of the child, and proceeded:

"Then, sir, if you should not disdain the rooms when you see them, I shall be too happy in having so good a gentleman under my roof. Pardon my boldness sir, but may I ask, I think by your dress you are a foreigner?"

"I am," replied Thaddeus, the sweetness which played over his features contracting into a gloom; "if you have no objection to receive a stranger within your doors, from this hour I shall consider it as my home."

"As your honour pleases," said Mrs. Robson, "my terms are half a guinea a week, and I will attend on you as though you were my own son; for I cannot forget, excellent young gentleman, the way in which we first met."

"Then I will leave you for the present," returned he, rising and putting down the little William, who had been amusing himself with examining the silver points of the star of St. Stanislaus, and would hardly now quit his knee: "In the mean while," said he, "my pretty friend," stooping to the child, "let this piece of silver," was just mounting to his tongue, as he had already put his hand into his pocket to take out half a crown, when he recollected that his necessities would no longer admit of such gifts, and drawing his hand back with a deep and bitter sigh, he touched the boy's cheek with his lips, and added, "let this kiss remind you of your new friend."

This was the first instance in the life of Sobieski, that his generous spirit had ever been restrained; and he felt it with a pang, for the poignancy of which he could not account.

He had been accustomed to an existence spent in acts of munificence. His grandfather's palace was the asylum of the unhappy; his grandfather's purse, a treasury for the unfortunate. The soul of Thaddeus did not degenerate from his noble relative; his generosity began in inclination, was nurtured by reflection, and strengthened by a daily exercise, that rendered it a habit of his nature. Want never appeared before him, without imparting such sympathetic emotion to his excellent heart, that he rested not till he had administered every comfort in the power of wealth to bestow. His compassion and his purse were the substance and the shadow of each other. The poor of his country thronged from every part of the kingdom, to receive pity and relief at his hands. With these houseless wanderers he peopled the new villages which his grandfather had caused to be erected in the midst of lands which in former times had been given up to wild beasts and desolation. Thaddeus participated in the happiness of these grateful tenants; and many were the old men whose eyes he had seen closed in thankfulness and peace. These honest peasants, even in their dying moments, wished to give up that life in his arms which he had rescued from misery. He has visited their cottage, he has smoothed their pillow, he has joined in their prayers, and when their last sigh came to his ear, he has raised the weeping family from the dust with pious exhortations, and his kindest assurances of protection. How often has the Countess clasped her godlike son to her breast, when, after a scene like this, he has returned home, the tears of the dying man and his children yet wet upon his hand? how often has she strained him to her heart, while floods of rapture have poured from her eyes? Heir to the first fortune in Poland, he scarcely felt the means by which he bestowed all these benefits; and with a soul as bounteous as heaven had been munificent to him, wherever he moved he shed smiles and gifts around him. How frequently has he said to the palatine, when his carriage wheels were chased by the thankful multitude, "O, my father, how can I ever be sufficiently grateful to God, for the happiness which he hath allotted to me, in making me the dispenser of so many blessings! The gratitude of these people overpowers and humbles me in my own eyes: what have I done to be so eminently favoured of heaven? I tremble when I ask myself the question." "You may tremble, my dear boy," replied his grandfather, "for indeed the trial is a severe one: prosperity, like adversity, is an ordeal of our conduct. Two roads are before the rich man: vanity and virtue: you have chosen the latter and the best; and may heaven ever hold you in it! May heaven ever keep your heart generous and pure! Go on, my dear Thaddeus, as you have commenced, and you will find that your Creator hath bestowed wealth upon you, not for what you have done, but as the means of evincing how well you would dispense the gift."

This was the fortune of Thaddeus; and now he who had scattered thousands without counting them, drew back his hand with a sensation something like horror at his own injustice, when he was going to give away one little piece of silver, which he might want in a day or two, to defray some indispensable debt.

"Mrs. Robson," said he, as he replaced his cap upon his head, "I shall return before it is dark."

"Very well, sir," and opening the door for him, he went out into the lane.

Ignorant of the town, and thanking Providence for having prepared for him an asylum, he directed his course towards Charing Cross. He looked about him, with a deepened sadness; the wet and palsy state of the streets, gave to every object so comfortless an appearance, that he could scarcely believe that he was in London, of which he had read with so much delight. Where were those magnificent buildings he expected to see in the emporium of the world? Where that cleanliness, and those tokens of greatness and splendour, which had been the admiration and boast of travellers? He could no where discover them; all seemed to him like a dark, gloomy, mean-looking city.

Hardly heeding whither he went, he approached the horse-guards; a view of the Park, as it appears through the wide porch, promised him less unpleasantness than a dirty pavement, and he turned in, taking his way along the Bird-Cage walk.

The trees stripped of their leaves, stood naked and dripping with melted snow. The season was in unison with the Count's fate. He was taking the bitter wind for his repast, and quenching his thirst with the rain that fell on his pale and feverish lip: he felt the cutting blast enter his breast; and shutting his eye-lids to repel the tears which were rising from his heart, he walked faster, but in spite of himself, the drops mingled with the wet that trickled from his cap down on his face. One melancholy thought introduced another, till his agitated soul lived over again, in memory, every calamity which had reduced him from happiness to misery. Two or three heavy and convulsed sighs followed these reflections; and quickening his pace, he walked once or twice round the Park: the rain had now ceased, and hardly observing any body that passed, he threw himself down upon one of the chairs, and sat in a musing posture, with his eyes fixed on the opposite tree.

A sudden sound of voices approaching, roused him; and turning his eyes, he saw the speakers were two young men, whom he judged by their dress, must belong to the regiment of the sentinel who was patrolling at the end of the mall.

"By heavens, Berrington," cried one, "it is the best shaped boot I ever beheld! I have a great mind to ask him whether it be English make."

"And if it be," replied the other, with a sneer, "you must ask him who made his legs, that you may send yours to be mended."

"Who the devil can see my leg through that boot?"

"Oh! if to hide them be your reason, pray ask him immediately."

"And so I will, for I think the boot damned handsome."

At these words, he was making up towards Sobieski with two or three long strides, when his companion pulled him back.

"Surely, Harwold, you will not act so ridiculously. He appears to be a foreigner of rank, and he may take affront and knock you down."

"Curse him and his rank too; he is some paltry emigrant, I warrant, and may the devil fly away with my legs if I don't ask him who made his boots."

As he spoke, he would have dragged his companion along with him, but Berrington broke from his arm, and the fool, who now thought himself dared to it, hustled up close to the chair, and bowed to Thaddeus, who, hardly crediting that he could be the subject of this dialogue, returned the salutation with a cold bend of his head.

Harwold looked a little confounded at this haughty demeanor, and whilst his face for once in his life blushed at his own insolence, he roared out as if in defiance of all shame:

"Pray, sir, where did you get your boots?"

"Where I got my sword, sir," replied Thaddeus, calmly; and, rising from his seat, he darted his eyes disdainfully on the coxcomb, and walked slowly down the mall. Surprised and shocked at such behaviour in a British officer, as he moved away, he distinctly heard Berrington laughing aloud, and ridiculing the astonishment and set-down air of his impudent associate.

This incident did not so much ruffle the temper of Thaddeus, as it amazed and perplexed him.

"Is this a specimen," thought he, "of a nation which, on the continent, is venerated for courage, manliness, and generosity? Well, I find I have much to learn. I must go through the ills of life, to estimate myself thoroughly; and I must study mankind themselves, and not in their history, to have a true knowledge of what they are."

This strange rencountre was of service to him, by diverting his mind into another channel, than the intense contemplation of his situation; and as the dusk drew on, he turned his steps towards the Hummums.

On entering the coffee-room, he was met by the obsequious Jenkins, who being told by Thaddeus that he wanted his baggage, and a carriage to be sent for, went for the things himself, and sent a boy for the coach.

A man dressed in black was standing by the chimney, and seemed to be eyeing Thaddeus, as he walked up and down, with great attention. Just as he had taken another turn, and drew near him, the stranger accosted him rather abruptly.

"Pray, sir, are there any news stirring abroad? you seem, sir, to be come from abroad?"

"None, that I know, sir."

"Bless me, that's strange. I thought, sir, you came from abroad, sir; from the continent, from Poland, sir? at least the waiter said so, sir."

Thaddeus coloured; "the waiter, sir?"

"I mean, sir," continued the gentleman, visibly confused at the dilemma into which he had brought himself, "the waiter said you were a count, sir, a Polish count, at least the Count Sobieski; hence I conclude you are from Poland. If I have offended, I beg pardon, sir; but in these times we are anxious for every intelligence."

Thaddeus made no other reply than a slight inclination of his head; and walking forward to see whether the coach had arrived, he thought, whatever travellers had related of the English, they were the most impertinent race of people in the world.

The stranger would not be contented with what he had already said, but plucking up new courage, pursued the Count to the glass door, through which he was looking, and resumed:

"I believe sir, I am not wrong: you are the Count Sobieski; and I have the honour to be now speaking with the bravest champion of Polish liberty."

Thaddeus again bowed: "I thank you, sir, for the compliment you intend me, but I cannot take it to myself; all the men in Poland, old and young, nobles and peasants, were her champions, equally sincere, equally brave."

Nothing could silense the inquisitive stranger: the coach drew up, but he went on.

"Then I hope that many of these patriots besides your lordship, have taken care to bring away their wealth from a land now abandoned to destruction?"

For a moment Thaddeus forgot himself in his country, and all her rights, and all her sufferings rose in his countenance.

"No, sir! not one of those men, and, least of all, would I have drawn one vital drop from her heart! I left in her bosom all that was dear to me, all that I possessed; and not until I saw the chains brought before my eyes, that were to lay her in irons, did I turn my back on calamities which I could no longer avert or alleviate."

The ardour of his manner, and the elevation of his voice, had drawn the attention of every person in the room upon him, when Jenkins entered with his baggage. The door being opened, Sobieski got into the coach, and gladly hastened from a conversation which awakened all his grief.

"Ah, poor enthusiast!" exclaimed his inquisitor, as the carriage drove off; "it is a pity that so fine a young man should have made so ill a use of his birth and other advantages!"

"He appears to me," observed an old clergyman, who sat in an adjoining box, "to have made the best possible use of his talents; and had I a son, I would rather hear him utter such a sentiment as that with which he quitted the room, than see him master of millions."

"May be so," cried the questioner, with a disdainful and angry glance, "Different minds incline to different objects!" His has decided for the "wonderful, the wild," and a pretty end he has made of his choice."

"Why, to be sure," observed another harker, "young people should be brought up with reasonable ideas of right and wrong, and prudence: nevertheless, I should not like a son of mine to run harem scarem through my property and his own life; yet one cannot help, when one hears such a brave speech as that from the foreigner just gone out, I say, one cannot help thinking it very fine."

"True, true," cried the inquisitor, "you are right, sir; very fine indeed, but too fine to wear; it would soon leave us naked, as it has done him, for it seems by his own confession he is pennyless; and I know a twelvemonth ago he was master of a fortune, which, however incalculable, he has managed, with all his talents, to see the end of."

"Then he is in distress?" exclaimed the clergyman, "and you know him?"

The man coloured at this unexpected inference, and stammering some words which no one could make out, took up his hat, and looking at his watch, said, "I beg pardon, gentlemen, I have an appointment," and hurried out of the room without speaking farther, notwithstanding the good clergyman, whose name was Blackmore, hastened after him, requesting to know where the young foreigner lived.

"Who is that coxcomb?" cried the disconcerted doctor, as he returned from his unavailing application.

"I don't know, sir," replied the waiter, "I never saw him in this house before last night, when he came in late to sleep; and this morning he was in the coffee room at breakfast, just as the foreign gentleman walked through; and Jenkins bawling his name out very loud, as soon as he was gone, this here gentleman in the powdered hair, asked him who that count was. I heard Jenkins say some Russian name, and tell him he came last night, and likely would come back again; and so that there gentleman has been loitering about all day till now, when the foreign gentleman coming in, he spoke to him."

"And don't you know any thing further of this foreigner."

"No, sir."

"I am sorry for that. Poor fellow!" sighed the old man, "he has been unfortunate, and I might have befriended him."

"Yes, to be sure, doctor," cried the speaker, who now rose to accompany him out, "it is our duty to befriend the unfortunate; but charity begins at home, and as all's for the best, perhaps it is lucky we did not hear any more about this young fellow. We might have involved ourselves in a vast deal of unnecessary trouble, and you know, the people of Poland have no claims upon us."

"Certainly," replied the doctor, "none in the world, more than those which no human creature can dispute, the claims of nature. All mankind are born heirs of suffering; and as joint inheritors, if we do not wipe away each other's tears, it will prove but a comfortless portion."

"Ah! doctor," cried his companion, as they separated at the end of Charles-street, "you have always the best of the argument; you have logic and Aristotle at your finger ends."

"No, my friend, my arguments are purely Christian. Nature is my logic, and the bible my teacher."

"Ah, there you have me again. You parsons are as bad as the lawyers; when once you get a poor sinner among you, he finds it as hard to get out of the church as out of the chancery. However, have it your own way; charity is your trade, and I won't be in a hurry to dispute the monopoly. Good day. If I stay much longer, you'll make me believe black is white."

Dr. Blackmore shook him by the hand, and wishing him a good morning, returned home, pitying the worldliness of his friend's mind; and pondering on the interesting stranger, whom he admired and compassionated to absolute pain; because he believed him to be unfortunate, and out of the reach of his services.

CHAPTER X.

The Count Sobieski was cordially received by his worthy landlady; indeed he never stood more in need of kindness. A slow fever, which had been gradually creeping over him since his quitting Poland, had settled on his lungs, and excited a cough, that kept him awake all night, and reduced him to such weakness in the day, that he neither had strength nor spirits to stir abroad.

Mrs. Robson was greatly distressed at this sudden and violent illness of her guest. Her own son, the father of the orphans whom she protected, had died a victim to consumption, brought on by his excesses.

Thaddeus gave himself up completely to her management; he had no money for medical assistance: and to please her, he took what little medicines she prepared. According to her advice, he remained for several days shut up in his chamber, with a large fire, his curtains drawn, and the shutters shut, to exclude the smallest portion of that air, which the good woman thought had already stricken him with death.

But all would not do; the patient became worse and worse.

frightened at the symptoms, Mrs. Robson begged leave to send for the apothecary, who had attended her deceased son. In this instance only, she found the Count obstinate; no arguments, nor even her tears, could move him. When she stood weeping, holding his burning hand, his answer was constantly of this kind:

"Do not, my excellent Mrs. Robson, grieve yourself on my account; I am not in the danger you think; I shall do very well with your assistance."

"No, no, I see death in your eyes. Can I feel this hand, and see that hectic cheek, without beholding your grave, as it were, opening before me?"

She was not much mistaken; for during the night after this debate, Thaddeus grew so delirious, that no longer able to subdue her terrors, she sent for the apothecary to come instantly to her house.

"O! doctor," cried she, as the man ascended the stairs, "I have the best young gentleman that ever the sun shone on, dying in that room! He would not let me send for you; and now he is raving like a mad creature."

Mr. Vincent entered the Count's humble apartment, and undrew the curtains of the bed. Thaddeus, exhausted by his delirium, had sunk back, almost senseless, on the pillow. Mrs. Robson, at this sight, supposing him dead, uttered a shriek that was in a moment echoed by the cries of the little William, who stood near his grandmother.

"Hush, my good woman," said the doctor in a low voice, "the gentleman is not dead; leave the room till you have recovered yourself, and I will engage that you shall see him alive when you return."

Mrs. Robson, considering all his words as oracles, quitted the room with her grandson.

Mr. Vincent had felt, on entering the chamber, that the fever of his patient must be augmented by the hot and stifling state of the room: and before he attempted to disturb him from the temporary rest which his senses found in insensibility, he opened the window shutters, damped the raging of he fire with ashes and water, and then unclosing the room loor wide enough to admit the air from the adjoining apartment, undrew all the curtains of the bed, and pulling the eavy clothes down from the Count's bosom, raised his head n his arm, and poured some drops into his mouth. In a ioment he opened his eyes, and uttered a few wild and incoherent words: but he did not rave, he only wandered, and appeared to know that he did so, for when he quite recovered his powers, he every now and then stopped in the midst of some confused speech, and inquired the tenor of his discourse.

Mrs. Robson soon after entered the room, and poured out her thanks to the apothecary, whom she regarded as almost a worker of miracles.

"I must have him bled, Mrs. Robson," continued he, "and for that purpose shall go home for my assistant and lancets; but, in the meanwhile, I charge you to let every thing remain in the state that I have left it. The heat alone would have been enough to have given a fever to a man in health."

When the apothecary returned, he saw that his commands had been strictly obeyed; and finding that the change of atmosphere had wrought some alteration in his patient, he took his arm without any difficulty, and bled him. At the end of the operation Thaddeus again fainted.

"Poor gentleman," cried Mr. Vincent, binding up the wound before he tried to recover him; "look here, Tom," pointing to the scars on his arm and breast, "see what terrible cuts have been made there! This has not been playing at soldiers! Who is your lodger, Mrs. Robson?"

"A Mr. Constantine, Mr. Vincent. But for heaven's sake restore him out of that swoon."

Mr. Vincent poured more drops into his mouth; and a minute afterwards he opened his eyes, divested of their feverish glare, but looking dull and heavy. He spoke to Mrs. Robson by her name; which gave her such delight, that she caught his hand to her lips, and burst into tears. The action was so instantaneous and violent that it made him feel the stiffness of his arm; and casting his eyes towards the men near his bed, he conjectured what had been his state, and what the consequence.

"Come, Mrs. Robson," said the apothecary, "you must not disturb the gentleman. How do you find yourself, sir."

Thaddeus having regained his perfect recollection, felt uneasy; but as the deed could not be recalled, he thanked the doctor for the service he had received, and said a few kind and grateful words to his hostess.

Mr. Vincent was glad to see so promising an issue to his proceeding, and soon after retired with his assistant and Mrs. Robson, to give further directions.

On entering the kitchen she threw herself into a chair, and broke into a paroxysm of lamentations.

"My good woman, what is all this about?" inquired the doctor, "is not my patient better?".

"Yes," cried she, drying her eyes; "but the bed in which he lies, the whole scene, puts me so in mind of the last moments of my poor unfortunate, misguided son, that the very thought of it goes through my heart like a knife. O! had my boy been as good as that dear gentleman, had he been as well prepared to die, I think I would scarcely have grieved! Yet, heaven spare Mr. Constantine. Will he live?"

"I hope so, Mrs. Robson: this fever is inveterate; but he is young, and with extreme care, we may preserve him."

"The Lord grant it!" cried she, "for he is the best gentleman that I ever beheld. He has been above a week with me, and till this night, in which he lost his senses, though hardly able to breathe or see, he has read out of books that he brought with him; and good books too: for it was but yesterday morning, I saw the dear soul sitting by the fire, with a book on the table, which he had been studying near an hour; and as I was dusting about, I saw him lay his head down on it, and put his hand on his temples. 'Alas! sir,' said I, 'you teaze your brains with these books of learning, when you ought to be taking rest.' 'No, Mrs. Robson,' returned he, with a sweet smile, 'in this book I am seeking rest; it is the best soother of human afflictions:' he closed it, and put it on the chimney-piece; and when I looked at it afterwards, I saw it was the scriptures. Can you wonder that I should love so excellent a gentleman?"

"It is a strange account you have given of your lodger," replied Vincent; "I hope he is not a methodist; for, if so, I shall despair of his cure, and think his delirium had another cause besides fever."

"A methodist! No, sir, he is a Christian: and as good a reasonable, sweet tempered gentleman, as ever came into a house. Alas! I believe he is more like a papist; though they say papists don't read the bible, but worship images."

"Why, what reason have you to suppose that? He's an Englishman, is he not?"

"O no, he is an emigrant."

"An emigrant! O, ho!" cried Vincent, with a discontented and contemptuous raise of his eyebrows and voice; "what, a poor Frenchman! Good Lord, how this town is overrun by these fellows!"

"No, doctor," exclaimed Mrs. Robson, much hurt in pride and feeling at this affront to her lodger, whom she really loved; "whatever he be, he is not poor, for he has a power of fine things; he has got a watch all over diamonds, and diamond rings, and diamond pictures without number. So, doctor, you need not fear that you are attending him for charity; no, I would sell my gown first."

"Nay, don't be offended, Mrs. Robson; I meant no offence," returned he, much mollified by this explanation of hers; "but really, when we see the bread that should feed our children, and our own poor, eaten up by a parcel of lazy French drones, who have covered our land and destroyed our produce, like a swarm of filthy locusts, we should be fools not to murmur. But Mr. Mr.—what did you call him, Mrs. Robson? is a different sort of a body."

"Mr. Constantine," replied she, "and indeed he is; and no doubt, when you recover him, he will pay you as though he were in his own country."

This last assertion of hers banished all remaining suspicion from the apothecary's face; and after giving her what orders he thought requisite, he returned home, promising to call in the evening.

Mrs. Robson went up stairs to the Count's chamber, with other feelings towards her infallible doctor than those with which she came down. She well recollected the substance of his discourse, and she gathered from it, that however clever he might be in his profession, he was a hard hearted man, who would rather see a fellow creature perish, than administer relief to him without a reward.

But here Mrs. Robson was mistaken. She did him justice in esteeming his medical abilities, which were great: he had made medicine the study of his life; and not allowing any irrelevant occupation to disturb his attention, he became master of that science, while ignorant of every other with which it had no connexion. He was the father of a family, and in the usual acceptation of the term, "a very good sort of a man:" he preferred his country to every other, because it was his country: he loved his wife and children: he was kind to the poor, to whom he gave his advice gratis, and letters to the dispensary for drugs; and when he had broken victuals to spare, he desired it to be divided among them; but he seldom caught his maid obeying this part of his commands, without reprimanding her for her extravagance in giving away what ought to be eaten in the kitchen; "in these times it was a shame to waste a crumb, and the careless hussy would come to want for thinking so lightly of other people's property."

Thus, like many in the world, he was a loyal citizen from habit, an affectionate father from nature, and a man of charity use he now and then felt pity, and now and then heard it ched from the pulpit. He was exhorted to be pious, and ur wine and oil into the wounds of the stranger; but it once struck him that piety extended farther than going urch, mumbling his prayers, and forgetting the sermon, gh most of which he generally slept; and his commentan the good Samaritan were not more extensive; for the ger, to him, was like the Canaanite embassy that cheated ost of Israel, his nearest neighbour. To have been born e other side of the British channel, spread an ocean ben the poor foreigner and Mr. Vincent's purse, which to our the swiftest wings of charity could never cross. "He no reason," he said, "for feeding the natural enemies of ountry. Would any man be mad enough to take the from his children's mouths, and throw it to a swarm of s just landed on the coast?" These wolves were his rite metaphors when he spoke of the unhappy French,

y other pennyless foreigners, who came in his way.
er this explanation, it will appear paradoxical to men-n inconsistency in the mind of Mr. Vincent, that would permit him to discover the above Cainish mark of vagasm upon the wealthy stranger of whatever country.
how or other, it was with him as with many: riches
a splendid and thick robe, that concealed all blemishes:
it away, and probably the poor stripped wretch would ated even worse than his crimes deserve.
at his new patient possessed some property, was suffi-to ensure the respect and medical skill of Mr. Vincent; hen he entered his own house, he told his wife that he ound "a very good job at Mrs. Robson's, in the illness Mr. Constantine, her lodger." nen the Count Sobieski quitted the Hummums, the even-n which he brought away his baggage, he had been so certed by the impertinence of the man who accosted hat he determined no longer to expose himself to insult, taining a title which rendered him obnoxious to the cuy of the insolent and insensible; and therefore, when Robson asked him how she should address him, as he verse to assuming a feigned name, he merely mentioned Constantine.
der that unobtrusive character he hoped in time to ac-modate his feelings to the change of fortune which Provihad allotted to him. He must forget his nobility, his and his sensibility: he must earn his subsistence. But by what means? He was ignorant of business; and he knew not how turn his accomplishments to account. Such were his meditations, till illness and delirium deprived him of these, and of reason together.

At the expiration of a week, in which Mr. Vincent attended his patient very regularly, Sobieski was able to remove into the front room, and leave that gloomy chamber where he had endured so much anguish of body and mind. Uneasiness about how he should discharge the debts he had incurred, retarded his recovery, and made his hours pass in cheerless meditation on the scanty means he possessed to repay the good widow, and satisfy the avidity of the apothecary, who, in proportion as his patient could bear the addition, had sent in phials of medicines by dozens. Pecuniary obligation was a load to which he had been unaccustomed; and, once or twice, the wish almost escaped his heart, that he had died.

Whenever he was left to think, such were always his reflections; but Mrs. Robson, who discovered that he appeared more feverish, and had worse nights after being much alone during the day, contrived, though she was obliged to be in her little shop, to leave either Nanny to attend his wants, or little William to amuse him.

The child by its uncommon quickness and artlessness of manner, gained upon the Count, who was ever alive to helplessness and innocence. Children and animals always found a friend and protector in him. From the "majestic war-horse with his neck clothed in thunder," to "the poor beetle that we tread upon," every creature of creation met an advocate of mercy in his breast: and as human nature is prone to love what it has been kind to, Thaddeus never saw either children, dogs, or even the poor slandered and abused animal the cat, that he did not by some spontaneous act show it attention.

The little William now possessed what affection he could spare from memory. He hardly ever left his side, where he sat on a stool, prattling about any thing that came into his head; or seated on his knee, followed with his eyes and playing fingers the Count's hand, as he sketched a horse, or a soldier, for his pretty companion.

In this way, he slowly acquired sufficient strength to allow him to quit his dressing-gown, and prepare for a walk.

A hard frost had succeeded to the chilling damps of November; and looking out of the window, he longed, with almost sensations of eagerness, again to inhale the fresh air. After some tender altercations with Mrs. Robson, who feared to trust him even down stairs, he at length conquered; and taking the little William in his hand, folded his pelisse round him, and promising to venture no farther than the king's Mews, was suffered to go out.

As he had expected, he found the keen breeze act like a charm on his debilitated frame, and with braced nerves, and exhilarated spirits, he walked twice up and down the place, whilst his companion played before him, throwing stones, and running to pick them up. At this moment one of the king's carriages, pursued by a concourse of people, suddenly drove in at the Charing Cross gate. The frightened child screamed and fell. Thaddeus seeing its danger, darted forward, and seizing the heads of the horses, which were within a yard of the boy, stopped them: meanwhile, the mob gathering about, one of them lifted up William, who continued his cries. The Count now let go the reins, and for a few minutes tried to pacify his little charge; but finding that his alarm and shrieks were not to be quelled, and that his own figure from his singularity of dress, (his high cap and feathers adding much to his height,) had drawn on him the whole attention of the people, who quitted the carriage and collected round him, he took the trembling child in his arms, and walking through the Mews, was followed by some of the by-standers almost to the door of Mrs. Robson's shop.

Seeing the people, and her grandson sobbing on the breast of her guest, she ran out and hastily asked what had happened. Thaddeus simply answered that the boy had been frightened. But when they entered the house, and he had thrown himself, exhausted, on a seat, William, as he stood by his knee, told his grandmother, that if Mr. Constantine had not stopped the horses, he must have been run over. The Count was now obliged to relate the whole story; which ended with the blessings of the poor woman for his goodness, to risk his own life in such a weak state for the preservation of her darling child.

Thaddeus in vain assured her, that the action deserved no thanks, as it was spontaneous and merely his duty.

"Well," cried she, "it is like yourself, Mr. Constantine: you think all your good deeds nothing; and yet any little odd thing that I can do out of pure love to serve you, you cry up to the skies. However, we won't fall out; I say heaven bless you, and that is enough! Has your walk refreshed you? But need not ask; you have already got a colour."

"Yes," returned he, rising and taking off his cap and cloak,

"it has put me in a glow, and made me quite another creature." As he finished speaking, he dropped the things from the hand that held them, and staggered back against the wall.

"Good Lord! what is the matter?" cried Mrs. Robson, alarmed, and looking in his face, which was now as pale as death, "what is the matter?"

"Nothing, nothing," returned he, recovering himself, and gathering up the cloak he had let fall, "don't mind me, Mrs. Robson; nothing," and he was leaving the kitchen to go up stairs: but she followed him, terrified at his looks and manner.

"Pray, Mr. Constantine!"

"Nay, my dear madam," said he, leading her back again, "I am not well: I believe my walk has overcome me. Let me be a few minutes alone, till I have recovered myself. It will oblige me."

"Well, sir, as you please," and she curtsied; then laying her withered hand fearfully upon his arm, as he was quitting the room, "Forgive me, dear sir," said she, "if my attentions are troublesome. Indeed, I fear that sometimes great love appears like great impertinence: I would always be serving you, and therefore I often forget the wide difference that there is between your honour's station and mine."

The Count could only press her hand gratefully, and with an emotion that made him hurry up stairs. When in his room he shut the door, and cast a wild and inquisitive gaze around the apartment, then throwing himself into a chair, he struck his head with his hand, and exclaimed, "It is gone! What will become of me? of this poor woman, whose substance I have consumed?"

It was true, the watch, by the sale of which he had calculated to defray the charges of his illness, and the sum that he was conscious he must owe Mrs. Robson, was indeed lost. A villain in the crowd, having perceived the sparkling of the chain to which it was united, had taken it unobserved from his side; and he knew nothing of his loss, till feeling for it to see the hour, he discovered his misfortune.

The shock went like a stroke of electricity through his frame; but it was not till the last glimmering of hope was extinguished, on his examining his room, where he thought he might have left it, that he felt the full horror of his situation.

He sat for some minutes absorbed, and almost afraid to think. It was not his own, but the necessities of the poor woman, who had, perhaps, incurred debts on herself to afford him comforts, that bore so hard upon him. At last, rising from his seat, he exclaimed,

"I must determine on something. Since this is gone, I must seek what else I have to part with, for I cannot long bear such suspense."

He opened the drawer into which he had locked the few valuables he had preserved.

With a trembling hand he took them out one by one. There were several trinkets which had been given to him by his mother; and a pair of inlaid pistols, that his grandfather had put into his belt on the morning of the dreadful tenth of October; his miniature lay beneath: the mild eyes of the palatine seemed beaming with affection upon his grandson: Thaddeus snatched it up, kissed it fervently, and then laid it back into the drawer, whilst he hid his face with his hands.

When he recovered himself, he replaced the pistols, feeling that it would be almost a sacrilege to part with them. Without allowing himself time to think, he put a gold pencil case and a pair of brilliant sleeve buttons into his waistcoat pocket.

He descended the stairs with a soft step, and passing the kitchen door unperceived by his landlady, crossed through a little court; and then anxiously looking from right to left, to find any place in which he might probably dispose of the trinkets, he took his way up Castle-street, and along Leicester square.

When he turned up the first street to his right, he was impeded by two persons, who stood in the path, the one selling, the other buying a hat. The thought immediately struck Thaddeus, of asking one of these men (who appeared to be a Jew and a vender of clothes) to purchase his pelisse. By parting with a thing to which he attached no more value than the warmth it afforded him, he should spare himself the pain, for this time at least, of sacrificing those gifts of his mother, which had been bestowed upon him in happier days, and hallowed by her caresses.

He did not permit himself to hesitate a moment but desired the Jew to follow him into a little court that was nigh. The man obeyed directly; and having no ideas independent of his trade, asked the count what he wanted to buy.

"Nothing: I want to sell this pelisse," returned he, opening it. The Jew without any ceremony, inspected the covering and fur.

"Aye, I see it is black lined with sable: who would buy it of me? It is embroidered, and nobody wears such things here."

"Then I am answered," replied Thaddeus.

"Stop, sir," cried the Jew, pursuing him; "what will you you take for it?"

"What would you give me?"

"Let me see. It is very long and wide. At the uttermost, I cannot offer you more than five guineas."

A few months ago, it had cost the Count twelve times as much; but glad to get any money, however small, he readily closed with the man's price; and taking off the cloak, without a sigh, he gave it to him, and put the guineas into his pocket.

He had not walked much farther, when the piercing cold of the evening, and a shower of snow which began to fall, made him feel the effects of his loss: however, that did not annoy him; he had been too heavily assailed by the pitiless rigours of misfortune, to regard the pelting of the elements. Whilst the wind blew in his face, and the sleet, falling on his dress, lodged in his embroidered lapels, he went forward calculating whether it were likely that this money, with the few shillings he yet possessed, would be sufficient to discharge what he owed. Unused as he had been to all kinds of expenditure that required attention, he supposed from what he had already seen of a commerce with the world, that the sum he had received from the Jew was not above half what he wanted; and with a beating heart he walked towards one of those shops which he had heard Mrs. Robson describe when she spoke of the irregularities of her son, who had nearly reduced her to beggary.

The candles were lit; and as he hovered about the door, he distinctly saw the master through the glass, assorting some parcels on the counter. He was a gentleman-like man; and the Count's feelings took quite a different turn from those with which he had accosted the Jew, who was a low sordid wretch, looking upon the people with whom he trafficked as pieces of wood; therefore, few unpleasant sensations assailed his breast when bargaining with him: but the sight of a respectable person before whom he was to present himself as a man in poverty, as one who in a manner appealed to charity, all at once overcame the resolution of Sobieski, and he debated whether he should return. Mrs. Robson and her probable distress rose before him; and fearful of trusting his pride any further, he pulled his cap over his face, stepped up the step, and entered the shop.

The man bowed very civilly on his entrance, and requested to be honoured with his commands. Thaddeus felt his face glow; but indignant at his own weakness, he walked up to the counter, and laying down the gold case, said in a voice, which notwithstanding his emotion he compelled to be without appearance of confusion, "I want to part with this."

The man, astonished at the dignity of his air, and the nobility of his dress, (for the star did not escape his eye,) looked at him for a moment, holding the case in his hand. The count, hurt by the steadiness of his gaze, rather haughtily repeated what he said. The man hesitated no longer. He had been accustomed to similar requests from the emigrant French noblesse: but there was a loftiness and an air of authority, in the countenance and mien of his person that surprised and awed him; and with a respect which even the application could not counteract, he opened the case, and inquired of Thaddeus what was the price he had affixed to it.

"I leave that to you," replied the count; "you see the gold is solid."

"Yes," returned the man, laying it down "but I cannot give more than three guineas. It is very thin; and though the workmanship be fine, it is not the fashion of England, and will be no benefit to me till melted."

"You may have it," said Thaddeus, hardly able to articulate, as he again laid the gift of his mother out of his hand.

The man directly paid him down the money, and the count, with a bursting heart, darted out of the shop.

Mrs. Robson was shutting up the windows of her little parlour, when he hastily passed her, and glided up stairs. Hardly believing her senses, she hastened after him, and just got into the room as he swallowed a glass of water.

"Good Lord, sir," cried she, "where has your honour been? I thought you had been all the while in the house, and I would not come near, though I was very uneasy: and there has been poor William crying himself blind, because you had desired to be left alone."

Thaddeus was not prepared to make her any answer. He had been in hopes to have gotten in as he had stolen out, undiscovered; for he had determined not to agitate her good mind by the history of his loss. He would not allow her to know any thing of his embarrassments, from sentiments of justice, as well as of that pride which all his sufferings and philosophy could not wholly subdue.

"I have been taking a walk, Mrs. Robson."

"Dear heart! I thought when you staggered back, and looked so ill after you brought in William, that you had overwalked yourself."

"No, I fancy my fears had a little discomposed me, and I hoped more air might do me good; I tried it, and it has; but I am grieved that I have alarmed you."

This ambiguous speech perfectly satisfied his kind landlady. Thaddeus, much fatigued by a bodily exertion, which nothing less than the perturbed state of his mind could have carried him through in the present feebleness of his frame, after he had taken some tea, at the earnest request of Mrs. Robson, went directly to bed, where tired nature soon found temporary repose in a profound sleep.

CHAPTER XI.

When the Count awoke in the morning, he found himself rather better than worse, from the exertions of the preceding day. When Nanny appeared as usual with his breakfast, and little William, (who always sat on his knee, and snared his bread and butter,) he desired to beg that her grandmother would send to Mr. Vincent, with his compliments, and tell him that he was so well at present, as to decline any further medical aid, and therefore requested to have his bill.

Mrs. Robson, who could not forget the behaviour of the apothecary, undertook to deliver the message herself, happy in the triumph she should experience over the littleness of Mr. Vincent's suspicions.

After the lapse of a quarter of an hour, she reappeared in the Count's room, with the apothecary's assistant; who, with many thanks, received the sum total of his account, which amounted to three guineas, for ten days' attendance.

The man having withdrawn, Thaddeus told Mrs. Robson that he must next defray the smallest part of that vast debt, which his heart should ever owe to her maternal care.

"O, bless your honour, it goes to my heart to take a farthing from you! but these poor children," cried she, laying a hand on each, and her eyes glistening, "they look up to me as their all here; and my quarter day was due yesterday, else, dear sir, I should have scorned to have been like Dr. Vincent, and have taken your money the moment you offered it."

"My good Madam," returned Sobieski, giving her a chair, 'I am sensible of the kindness of your nature; but it is your just due, and the payment of it can never lessen my gratitude for the friendship that you have shown to me as a stranger."

"Then there, sir," said she, looking almost ashamed, as if she were robbing him when she laid it on the table, "there is my bill. I have regularly set down every thing. Nanny ng it to me." And the good woman, quite disconcerted, out of the room.

ldeus looked after her with sensations of admiration erence.

ere goes," thought he, "in that lowly and feeble frame, rous and noble a spirit, as ever animated the breast of ess! Here, Nanny," said he, glancing his eye over the "there are the two guineas and a half, with my thanks; your grandmother that I am astonished at her eco-affair over, the Count found himself relieved of a is load; and turning the remaining money in his hand, might replenish his little stock before it was expended, cupied his attention. Notwithstanding the pawnbro- vil treatment, he recoiled at again presenting himself hop. Besides, should he dispose of all that he pos- it would not be of sufficient value to subsist him for a

He must think of some source within himself, not to be so soon exhausted. To be reduced a second the misery of mind that he had experienced yesterday, spense and wretchedness, appeared too dreadful to be ed; and he ran over in his memory the merits of his accomplishments.

ould not make any use of his musical talents, for at exhibitions of himself his soul revolted: and as to his acquirements, he supposed that his youth, and being ner, would preclude all hope on that head. At length id that his sole dependence must rest on his talents ting. Of this art he had always been remarkably fond; taste easily perceived, when he passed by several of at shops in town, that there were many drawings exhi- r sale, much beneath those which he had executed for astime.

ecided at once; and sending Nanny to purchase pencils lian ink, set to work.

n he had finished a half a dozen drawings, and was con- g how he might find the street wherein he had seen the hops, the recollection occurred to him of the impression is appearance had made on the pawnbroker. He per- the wide difference between his apparel and the fashion land; and, seeing with what better security from im- nce he might walk about, if he could so far cast off the f his former rank as to change his dress, he got up with ention to go out and purchase a surtout coat and hat, for that purpose: but catching an accidental view of his figur and the star of St. Stanislaus, as he passed the glass to th door, he no longer wondered at the curiosity which such ar appendage, united with poverty, had attracted. Rather than again subject himself to a similar situation, he summoned his young messengor, and through her means, furnished himself with an English hat and coat; whilst with his penknife he cut away the embroidery of the order from the cloth to which it was affixed.

Thus accoutred, with his hat flapped over his face, and his great-coat wrapped round him, he put his drawings in his bosom, and about eight o'clock, walked out on his disagreeable errand. After some wearying search, he at last found Great Newport-street, the place he wanted; but as he advanced, his hopes died away, and his fears and reluctance awakened.

He stopped at the door of the nearest print-shop. All that he had experienced at the pawnbroker's re-assailed him if possible with redoubled violence. What he had presented there, possessed a fixed value, and was at once to be taken or refused; but now he was going to offer things of mere taste, and he might meet, not only with a flat denial, but affronting remarks.

He walked to the threshold of the door, then as hastily withdrew again, and hurried two or three paces down the street.

"Weak, contemptible, that I am!" said he to himself as he again turned round, "where is all my reason and rectitude of principle, that I would rather endure the misery of dependence and self-reproach, than face the attempt to seek support from the fruits of my own industry?"

He quickened his step, and darted into the shop, almost fearful of his former irresolution. He threw his drawings instantly upon the counter.

"Sir, you purchase drawings. I have these to sell. Will they suit you?"

The man took them up without deigning to look at the person who accosted him, and turning them over in his hand, "One, two, three, hum! there is half a dozen of them. What do you expect I will give you for them?"

"I am not acquainted with the prices of these things."

Hearing this, he thought by managing well, to get them for what he liked, and throwing them over with an air of contempt, resumed:

"And pray where may the views be taken?"

"They are recollections of different scenes in Germany."

"Ah," replied the man, "mere drugs! I wish, my honest friend, that you could have brought subjects not quite so threadbare, and a little better executed; they are but poor things at best."

Thaddeus, insulted by the speech, and above all, the manner of the print seller, was snatching up the drawings to leave the shop without a word, when the man observing his design, and afraid to lose them, laid his hand on the heap, exclaiming:

"Let me tell you, young man, it does not become a person in your situation to be so huffy to their employers. I will give you a guinea for the six, and you may think yourself well paid."

Without farther hesitation, whilst the Count was striving to subdue the choler that was urging him to knock him down, he had laid the money on the counter, and was slipping the drawings into a drawer, when Thaddeus snatched them out again, suddenly rolled them up, and turning to the confounded print seller, walked out of the shop as he said:

"Not all the wealth you may possess, would tempt an honest man to pollute himself by exhanging a second word with one so contemptible."

Irritated and vexed, he returned home, too much provoked to think much of the consequence that might follow a similar disappointment.

The widow, who had become in some measure used to the fluctuations of the Count's looks and behaviour, ceased altogether to tease him with inquiries which she saw he was loth to answer. She now allowed him to walk in and out without a remark; and silently contemplated his pale and melancholy countenance, when after a ramble of the greatest part of the day, he returned home exhausted and dispirited.

William was always the first to welcome his friend at the threshold, by running to him, taking hold of his coat, and asking to go with him up stairs. The Count usually gratified him: and unclouding his mind of the gloom that nearly obscured it, to devise any little plays which could produce pleasure, where he now found that he felt so much affection, he brightened many dull moments with his innocent caresses.

This child was literally his chief comfort; for he saw that in him he could still raise those emotions of happiness, which had once afforded him his sweetest joy. William ever greeted him with smiles; and when he entered the kitchen, sprang to his bosom, as if that were the seat of peace, as it was of virtue. But, alas! fortune seemed averse to lend any thing long to the unhappy Thaddeus, which might render his desolate state more tolerable.

Just arisen from the bed of sickness, he rather required the hand of some tender nurse to restore his wasted vigour, than be reduced to sustain the hard vigils of poverty and want. His recent disappointment, and a cold that he caught, increased his fever and debility; yet he kept firm to the determination not to appropriate to his own subsistence the sale of the few valuables which he had assigned as a deposit for the charges of his rent; and accordingly, during a fortnight, never tasted any thing better than bread and water, accompanied by the thought, that if it ended in his death, his sufferings would then be over, and the widow remunerated by what little of his property might remain.

In this state of body and mind, he received a most painful shock, when, one evening returning from a walk, in the place of his little favourite, he met Mrs. Robson, in tears, at the door. She told him that William had been sickening all the day, and was now so delirious that neither she nor his sister could hold him quiet.

Thaddeus went to the side of the child's bed, where he lay gasping on the pillow, with his little face the colour of scarlet, held down by the crying Nanny. The Count touched his cheek.

"Poor child," exclaimed he, "he is in a high fever. Have you sent for Mr. Vincent?"

"O, no, I had not the heart to leave him."

"Then I will go directly," returned Thaddeus; "there is not a moment to be lost."

The poor woman thanked him. Hastening through the streets with a velocity and eagerness that nearly overset many of the foot passengers, he arrived at Lincoln's Inn Fields, and in less than five minutes after he had quitted Mrs. Robson's door, he brought back the apothecary.

On Mr. Vincent's examining the pulse and countenance of his little patient, he declared the symptoms to be the small-pox, which some casualty had repelled, but must be brought out, else the boy's life might be endangered.

Mrs. Robson, in a paroxysm of distress, now recollected, that a girl had been brought into her shop three days ago, just recovered from that frightful malady. Thaddeus tried to subdue the fears of the grandmother; and at last succeeded in persuading her to go to bed, whilst he and Nanny would watch by the pillow of the invalid.

Towards morning the disorder broke out in the child's face, and he recovered his recollection. The moment he fixed his eyes on the Count, who was leaning over him with parental solicitude, he stretched out his little arms, and begged to lie on his breast. Thaddeus refused him gently, fearful that by any change of position he might catch cold, and so again retard what had now so fortunately appeared; but the poor child felt the denial unkind, and began to weep so violently, that his anxious friend thought it better to gratify him than hazard the irritation of his fever by agitation and crying.

Thaddeus took him out of bed, and rolled him in one of the blankets, laid him in his bosom, drawing his dressing-gown round him to shield his face from the fire, and held him in that situation asleep for nearly two hours.

When Mrs. Robson came down stairs at six o'clock in the morning, she kissed the hand of the Count as he sustained her grandson in his arms, and almost speechless with gratitude to him, and solicitude for the child, waited the arrival of the apothecary.

On his second visit, he said a few words to her of comfort; but whispered to the Count, as he was feeling William's pulse, that nothing short of the strictest care could save the boy, the infection he had received having been of the most malignant sort.

These words of Mr. Vincent fell like an unrepealed sentence on the heart of Thaddeus. They seemed prophetic. Casting his eyes down on the discoloured features of the patient infant, he fancied that he already beheld its clay-cold face and its little limbs stretched out in death. The idea was bitterness to him; and pressing the boy to his breast, he resolved that no attention should be wanting on his part, to preserve him one moment from the grave. And he kept his promise.

From that hour till the day on which the poor babe expired in his arms, he never laid him out of them for ten minutes together; and when he did breathe his last sigh, and raised up his little eyes, Thaddeus met their dying glance with a pang, which he thought his soul had lost the power to feel. His heart appeared to stop: and, covering the motionless face of the dead child with his hand, unable to speak, he made a sign to Nanny to leave the room.

The girl, who, from respect, had been accustomed to obey even his slightest nod, went to her grandmother, who was in the shop serving a customer.

The instant that the girl had quitted the room, the Count, with mingled awe and grief, lifted the corpse from his knee and without allowing himself to cast another glance on th face of the poor little thing, now released from suffering, l put it on the bed, and throwing a sheet over it, sunk into chair, and burst into tears.

The entrance of Mrs. Robson in some measure restore him; for the moment she perceived her guest with his hand kerchief over his eyes, she judged what had happened, an with a piercing scream, flew forward to the bed, where, pullin down the covering, she uttered another shriek, and must hav fallen on the floor, had not Thaddeus and little Nanny, wh ran in at her cries, caught her in their arms, and bore her to chair.

Her feelings were too much agitated to allow her to continu long in a state of insensibility; and when she recovered, sh would have again approached the dead child; but the Coun held her down, trying by every means in his power to sooth her, so far succeeded as to subdue her agonies to tears.

Whilst she concealed her venerable head in the bosom o her grand-daughter, he once more lifted the remains of the little William; and thinking it best for the tranquillity of the unhappy grandmother to take him out of her sight, carried him up stairs, and laid him on his own bed.

By the time he had returned to the kitchen, one of the female neighbours, having heard an unusual outcry, and suspecting the cause, had kindly stepped in to offer her consolation and services. Mrs. Robson could only reply by groans, which were answered by the sobs of poor Nanny, who lay weeping with her head against the table.

When the Count came down, he thanked the good woman for her benevolent intentions, and immediately accepting them, took her up stairs into his apartments. Pointing to the open door of the bed room, "There, madam," said he, "you will find the remains of my dear little friend. I beg that you will direct every thing for his interment, as you think would give satisfaction to Mrs. Robson. I would spare that excellent woman every pang in my power."

All was done according to his desire; and Mrs. Watts, the charitable neighbour, both from her own tenderness of disposition, and a reverence for the extraordinary young gentleman who lodged with her friends, performed her task with kindness and activity.

"O! sir," cried Mrs. Robson, weeping afresh, as she entered the Count's room, "O! sir, how shall I ever repay all goodness? and Mrs. Watts, good soul! she has acted a sister to me. But indeed, indeed, I am yet the most miserable woman that lives. I have lost my dearest child, and must strip his poor sister and myself to bury him. That cruel Dr. Vincent, though he might have imagined my distress, sent his account late last night, saying he wanted to make up a large bill, and he wished I would let him have all, or a part of the payment. Heaven knows, I have not a farthing in the house; but I will send poor little Nanny out to pawn my silver spoons; for, alas! I have no other means of satisfying the cruel man."

"Rapacious wretch!" cried Thaddeus, rising indignantly from his chair, and for a moment forgetting how incapable he was to afford her relief. "You shall not be indebted one instant to his mercy. I will pay him."

The words had passed his lips: he could not retract; though conviction immediately followed, that he had not the means: and he would not have retracted, even should he be necessitated to sell all that he possessed.

Mrs. Robson was overwhelmed by this generous promise, which indeed saved her from ruin. Had her little plate been sold, it could not have covered half of Mr. Vincent's demand: who, to do him justice, would as soon have swallowed the bitterest drug in his shop, as to have done any thing intentionally to cause the distress that he had occasioned. But, having been so readily paid by Thaddeus for his own illness, and observing his great care and affection for the deceased child, he did not doubt that, rather than allow Mrs. Robson a minute's uneasiness, her lodger would likewise defray that bill. So far he calculated right; but he had not sufficient sagacity to prognosticate, that in getting his money this way, he should directly lose the respect of Mrs. Robson and her friend.

The child was to be buried to-morrow; the expenses of which, Thaddeus foresaw that he must discharge also: and he had engaged to pay Mr. Vincent to-night. He had not a shilling in his purse. Over and over he contemplated the impracticability of answering these debts: yet he could not for an instant repent of what he had undertaken; he thought he was amply recompensed for bearing so heavy a load, in seeing that he had taken it off the worn down heart of another.

Since his unmannerly treatment at the print seller's, he had never sufficiently conquered his pride, to attempt an application to another. Whence he had no prospect now, but to collect the money by selling some more things to the pawnbroker, who had behaved at least with civility.

For this purpose, he took his sabre, his pistols, and the fated brilliant buttons, which he had brought back on a similar errand. He lifted them out of their deposit with less reluctance than before. They were now going to be an offering of gratitude and benevolence: an act which he knew his parents, were they alive, would warmly approve; and he felt that the end sanctified the means.

It was about half after six in the evening, when he prepared himself for his task. Whether it be congenial with melancholy to seek the gloom, or whether the Count found himself less observed under the shades of night, is not evident; but since his exile, he preferred the dusk to any other part of the day.

Before he went out, he asked Mrs. Robson for Mr. Vincent's bill. Almost sinking with the obligation and shame, she put it into his hand, and he left the house. When he approached a lighted lamp, he opened the paper to see the amount, and finding it was near two pounds, he hastened forwards to the pawnbroker's.

The man was in the shop alone. Thaddeus thought himself fortunate; and after subduing a few qualms, immediately entered the door. The moment he laid his sword and pistols on the counter, and declared his wish, the man, even through the disguise of a large coat, and slouched hat, recollected him. The honest money lender carried sentiments in his breast above his occupation. He did not feel for all the people that presented themselves before him, because many bore about them too evident tokens of the excesses which brought them to his shop; but there was something in the figure and manner of the Count Sobieski, that struck him at first sight: and by keeping its station in his thoughts, had excited so much interest in his mind, that he felt a sensation of pleasure when he discerned the noble foreigner in the person before him.

Mr. Burnet (for so this money lender was called) asked him what he demanded for the arms.

"I want, perhaps, more than you would give. But I have something else here," laying down the diamonds; "I want eight guineas."

Mr. Burnet looked at them, and then at their owner, hesitated, and he spoke:

"I beg your pardon, sir: I hope I shall not offend you; these things appear to have a value annexed to them, independent of their price: they are inlaid with crests and cy-blood flushed over the cheeks of the Count. He had ten this circumstance: unable to answer, he waited to hat the man would say.

epeat, sir, I mean not to offend, but you appear a stranthese transactions. I only wish to suggest, that in case ould ever like to repossess these things, had you not pledge them?"
ow?" asked Thaddeus, irresolutely, and not knowing o think of the man's manner.
hat instant some other people came into the shop; and rnet, gathering up the diamonds and the arms in his said, "If you do not object, sir, we will settle this busi-my back parlour."
delicacy of this behaviour penetrated the mind of Thadand without further demurring, he followed him into a As Mr. Burnet offered his guest a chair, the Count neously took off his hat, and laid it on the table. Burntemplated the saddened dignity of his countenance, newed interest and respect; and entreating him to be renewed the conversation.
ee, sir, that you do not understand the meaning of g, or pawning, for it is one and the same thing: but I plain it in two words. If you will leave these things e, I will give a paper in acknowledgment, and lend on ne eight guineas you request; which, when you return gain, with a stated interest, you shall have your de-exchange."
eski received this offer with pleasure and thanks. He ertained no idea of any thing more being meant by the f pawn-broker, than a man that bought what others ell.
en, sir," continued Burnet, opening an escrutoire, "I e you the money, and write the paper I spoke of."
he put his hand to a drawer, he heard voices in an g passage; and instantly shutting up the desk, caught things on the table, threw them behind a curtain, and taking the Count by the hand, "My dear sir," cried oblige me and step into that closet: you will find a
A person is coming, whom I will despatch in a few
."
ideus, rather surprised at such hurry, did as he was
; and the door was closed on him, just as the parlour ened. Being aware, from the concealing of him, that itor came on secret business, he found his situation not a little awkward. Seated behind a curtain window, which the lights in the room made transparent, he could not avoid seeing as well as hearing every thing that passed.

"My dear Mr. Burnet," cried an elegant young creature who ran into the apartment, "positively without your assistance I shall be undone."

"Any thing in my power, madam," returned Mr. Burnet, in a distant, respectful voice; "will your ladyship sit down?"

"Yes, give me a chair: I am half dead with distraction.—Mr. Burnet, I must have another hundred upon those jewels."

"Indeed, my lady, it is not in my power; you have already had twelve hundred, and upon my honour that is a hundred and fifty more than I ought."

"Pugh! who minds the honour of a pawnbroker?" cried the lady, laughing; "you know very well you live by cheating."

"Well, ma'am," returned he, with a goodnatured smile, "as your ladyship pleases."

"Then I please that you let me have another hundred. Why, man, you know that you lent Mrs. Hinchinbroke two thousand upon a case of diamonds not a quarter so many as mine."

"But consider, madam, Mrs. Hinchinbroke's were of the best water."

"Positively, Mr. Burdet," exclaimed her ladyship, purposely miscalling his name, "not better than mine. The king of Sardinia gave them to Sir Charles when he knighted him. I know mine are the best, and I must have another hundred. Upon my soul, my servants have not had a guinea of their wages these four months, and they tell me they are starving! Come, make haste, Mr. Burnet; you cannot expect me to stay here all night."

"Indeed, my lady, I cannot."

"Heavens, what a brute of a man you are! There," cried she, taking a string of pearls from her neck, and throwing it on the table; lend me some of your trumpery out of your shop, for I am going immediately from hence to take up the Miss Dundasses to the play; and so give me the hundred on that, and let me go."

"This is not worth a hundred."

"What a teasing man are you!" cried her ladyship, angrily. "Well, let me have the money now, and I will send you the bracelets that belong to the necklace to-morrow."

"Upon those conditions, I will give your ladyship another hundred."

"O, do; you are the veriest miser I ever met with. You are worse than Shylock, or—Good Lord! what is this?" exclaimed she, interrupting herself, and taking up the draft he had laid before her; "and have you the conscience to think, Mr. Pawnbroker, that I will offer this at your banker's? that I will expose myself so far? No, no; take it back, and give me gold. Come, despatch! else I cannot go to the play. Look, there is my purse," added she, showing it, "make haste and fill it."

After satisfying her demands, Mr. Burnet handed her ladyship out the way she came, which was by a private passage; and having seated her in her carriage, made his bow.

Meanwhile, the Count Sobieski, wrapped in astonishment at the profligacy which the scene he had witnessed implied, remained in his concealment till the pawnbroker returned and opened the closet door.

"Sir," said he, colouring, "you have, undesignedly on your part, been privy to a very delicate affair; but my credit, sir, and your honour—"

"Shall both be sacred," replied the Count, anxious to relieve the poor man from the perplexity in which he seemed to think himself involved, and therefore forbearing to express any surprise; but Burnet perceived it in his look; and before he proceeded to fulfil his engagement with him, stepped half way to the escrutoire, and resumed:

"You appear amazed, sir, at what you have seen. And if I am not mistaken, you are from abroad."

"Indeed I am amazed," replied Sobieski; "and I am from a country where the slightest suspicion of a transaction such as this, would brand the woman with infamy."

"And so it ought," answered Burnet; "though by that sentiment I speak against my own interest; for it is by such ladies as Lady Villiers that we make our money. Now, sir," continued he, drawing nearer to the table, "perhaps, after what you have just beheld, you will not hesitate to credit what I am going to tell you. I have now in my hands the jewels of one Duchess, three Countesses, and women of fashion without number. When they have an ill run at play, they apply to me in their exigencies; first, by bringing their diamonds here, or when their husbands suppose them at their banker's, or in their own house, and as their occasions require, on this deposit I lend them money; for which they make a handsome present when they are released."

"Gracious heaven!" exclaimed Thaddeus, "what a grading system of deceit must be the whole lives of t women!"

"It is very lamentable," returned Burnet, "but so i And they continue to manage matters very cleverly. giving me their note or word of honour, (for if these ladies not honourable with me, I have their reputations so muc my power, that I could destroy them at once, therefore I. them in awe; and whatever be their characters, I have fears on that head,) I allow them to have the jewels ou the birth-days, and receive them again when their exhibi is over. As a compensation for these little indulgence generally have additions to the present at the end."

Thaddeus could hardly believe such a history of those men, whom travellers mentioned, as not only the most lov but the most amiable creatures in the world.

"Surely, Mr. Burnet," cried he, "these women must pise each other: and become contemptible even to our se

"Oh, no," rejoined the pawnbroker, "they seldom t each other in these affairs. All my fair customers are no silly as that pretty little lady who just now left us. She, another woman of quality, have made each other confidant this business. And lord have mercy upon me when they c together! They are as ravenous of my money as if I had other use for it than to supply them. As to their husba brothers, and fathers, they are usually the last people suspect or hear of these matters. Their applications, w they run out, are made to Jews and professional usurer race completely out of our line."

"But, are all English women of quality of this disgrac stamp?"

"No, heaven forbid!" cried Burnet; "if these spendtl madams were not held in awe by their dread of superior racters, we should have no dependence whatever on their mises. O, no, there are ladies about court whose virtues as eminent as their rank; women, whose actions might a performed in mid-day, before the world; and them, I n see within my doors."

"Well, Mr. Burnet," rejoined Thaddeus smiling, "I glad to hear that. Yet I cannot forget the unexpected of the so famous British fair, which this night has offered to eyes. It is strange!"

ery bad indeed, sir," returned the man, giving him , and the paper that he had been preparing; "but if d have occasion to call again upon me, perhaps you stonished still farther."
ount bowed, and thanking him for his kindness,
m a good evening, and left the shop.
about seven o'clock when Thaddeus arrived at the y's. Mr. Vincent was from home. To say the ad purposely gone out of the way. For, though he esitate to commit a shabby action, he had not couace its consequences; and, to avoid the probable nces of Mrs. Robson, he had commissioned his as-receive the amount of the bill. The Count, without n observation, having paid the man, was returning l, along Duke-street, and the piazzas of Drury-Lane hen the crowd that was pressing round the doors
d him to stop.
wo or three more ineffectual attempts to get through , without throwing himself into the midst of the groups that were passing from their carriages to the retreated a little behind the mob, at the moment ariot drew up, and a gentleman stepping out with , darted with them into the house. One glance was for the Count, who recognized his friend, Pembroke
, in high dress, gay, and laughing. The heart of s sprang to him at the sight; and forgetting his negis own misfortunes, he ejaculated "Somerset."
ling with eagerness and pleasure, he pressed through l, and entered the passage at the instant the green in upon his friend.
isappointment was dreadful. To be so near Somer-o lose him, was more than he could sustain. His heart recoiled; and the chill of despair running is veins, turned him almost faint. Leaning against he took his hat off to give himself a little air. He ely stood a minute in this situation, revolving whe-hould follow his friend into the house, or wait till he again, when a gentleman begged him to make way y of ladies that were entering. Thaddeus moved on but the opening of the green door casting a strong h on his face, and the group behind, his eyes and he impertinent inquisitor of the Hummums met each

ier the man was conscious that he deserved chastise-ment for his former insolence, and dreaded to meet it now cannot be explained, but he turned pale, and shuffled by Thaddeus, as if he were fearful to trust himself a second time within reach of his grasp. For the Count, he was too deeply interested in his own pursuit, to waste one surmise about him.

He continued to ponder on the sudden and unexpected sight of Pembroke Somerset, which had conjured up ten thousand fond and distressing recollections; and with impatient anxiety determining to watch till the performance was over, he thought of inquiring his friend's address of the servants: but on looking round for that purpose, perceived that the chariot had driven away.

Thus foiled, he returned to his post near the green door, where he soon saw it opened several times by footmen passing and repassing. Judging that the chamber within might be a lobby, in which he would be less likely to miss his object, he entered with the next person that approached; and seeing seats along the sides of the place, he sat down on the one nearest to the stairs.

His first idea was to proceed into the play-house. But, on reflection, he considered the little chance of finding any individual in so vast a building, as not equal to the expense he should incur. Besides, from the dress of the gentlemen who entered the box door, he was sensible that a great coat and round hat were not admissible.

Having remained near an hour, with his eyes invariably fixed on the stairs, he observed the same curious person, who had passed almost directly after his friend, came down the steps and walked out of the door. In two minutes he was returning again with a smirking countenance, and alert steps, when his eyes accidentally falling on the Count, (who sat with his arms folded, and himself almost hidden by his hat and the shadow of the wall) he appeared to falter in his walk, and stretching out his neck toward him, the gay grin left his features, and exclaiming in an impatient voice, "confound him!" he hastened once more into the house.

This rencounter with his Hummums acquaintance, affected Thaddeus as slightly as the former; and without even annexing a thought to his figure, as it flitted by him, he remained watching the passage till half after eleven; at which hour, the doors being thrown open, the company began to pour forth.

The Count's hopes were again on his lips, and in his eyes ıe first party that came down the steps, he immediately ınd planting himself close to the bottom stair, drew ɔver his face, and narrowly examined each group as it ed. Every fresh set that he heard approach, made his alpitate. How often did his heart rise and fall during ; successions, which continued moving for near half an velve, the house was completely cleared. He saw the ıoor locked; and motionless with disappointment, did mpt to stir, till the man who held the keys told him to e was about to fasten the other doors.

roused Thaddeus. And as he was preparing to obey, d the man if there was any other passage from the ı," cried he, "there is one that goes into Drury-lane." ɔn, by that I have lost him!" was the reply which he himself. And returning homewards, he arrived there ınutes after twelve.

CHAPTER XII.

ɔDEUS awoke in the morning, with his heart full of the ht's rencounter. One moment, he regretted that he been seen by his friend; and in the next, when he surıis altered state, was almost reconciled to the dısapınt; then, reproaching himself for a pride so unbehis principles, and dishonourable to friendship, he if he were in Somerset's place, and Somerset in his, r he could ever pardon that morose delicacy, which ɔrevent the knowledge of his friend's misfortunes and in the same kingdom.
e reflections soon persuaded his judgment to what he much inclined, determining him to inquire Pembroke's of every one likely to know a man of Sir Robert Sos consequence; and then to venture a letter.
e midst of the meditations the door opened, and Mrs. ı appeared before him, drowned in tears.
r dear, dear sir!" cried she, "my William is going; I ıst taken my last look of its sweet face. Will you go ınd say farewell of the poor child you loved so dearly?"
ı, my good madam," returned Thaddeus, his straying ts at once gathering round this sad centre, "I will rather retain you here until the melancholy task be entirely accomplished."

With a gentle violence he forced her upon a seat, and in silence supported her head on his side, against which she unconsciously leaned and wept. He listened with a painful melancholy to the removal of the coffin; and at the closing of the street-door, which for ever shut the little William from that house in which he had been the source of pleasure. A tear trickled down the cheek of Thaddeus, and the groans of the poor grandmother were audible.

The Count, incapable of speaking, squeezed her hand in his.

"O! Mr. Constantine," cried she, "see how my supports, one after the other, are taken from me! first my son, and now his infant! To what shall I be at last reduced?"

"You have still, my good Mrs. Robson, a friend in heaven, that will supply the place of all that you have lost on earth."

"True, dear sir; I am a wicked creature to speak as I have done; but it is hard to suffer; it is hard to lose all we love in the world."

"It is," returned the Count, greatly affected at her grief. "But you are not yet deprived of all: you have a granddaughter."

"Ah! poor little thing! what will become of her when I die? I used often to think what a precious brother my darling William would have proved to his sister, when I should be no more."

This additional distress which her fancy had conjured up, augmented the affliction of the good old woman; and Thaddeus looked at her with his compassionate soul beaming in his eyes, exclaiming, "Mrs. Robson, the same Almighty Being that protected me, the last of my family, will protect the offspring of so excellent a woman as yourself."

Mrs. Robson lifted up her head for a moment. She had never before heard him utter a sentence of his own history; and what he had now let drop, added to the tender solemnity of his manner, for an instant arrested her attention. He went on:

"In me, you see a man, who within a short space of three months, hath lost a grandfather that loved him as fondly as you did your William; a mother whom he saw expire before him, and whose sacred remains he was forced to leave in the hands of her murderers! Yes, Mrs. Robson, I have neither parents nor a home. I was a stranger, and you took me in; and heaven will reward your family in kind. At least, I prose that, whilst I live, whatever be my fate, should you be lled hence, I will protect your grand-daughter with a brother's ection."

"May heaven in its mercy bless you," cried Mrs. Robson, opping on her knees. Thaddeus raised her with gushing es; and having replaced her in a seat, left the room for a w minutes to recover himself.

In the evening, Mrs. Watts, according to the Count's de re, called with an estimate of the expenses attending the ild's interment. Fees and every thing collected, the demand i his benevolence was six pounds. This sum proved rather ore than he expected, but he paid it without a demur, leaving mself only a few shillings.

He considered what he had done as the fulfilment of a duty indispensable, that it must have been accomplished even by ie sacrifice of his uttermost farthing. Gratitude and distress eld claims upon him, which he would never allow his neces ties in the smallest instance to transgress. All gifts of mere merosity were beyond his power, and consequently in a short me beyond his wish; but to the cry of want and wretched ess, his hand and heart were ever open. Often has he in the reet given away to a starving child that pittance which was purchase his own hard meal, and never felt such neglect of mself a privation. To have turned his eyes and ears from ie little mendicant, would have been the hardest struggle; nd the remembrance of such inhumanity would have haunted im to his pillow. This being the natural disposition of the ount Sobieski, it had been so fostered and directed by the merable palatine, that he now found it more difficult to bear lamity when viewing another's poverty, whom he could not lieve, than when penury assailed himself in all its shapes of solation.

Towards night, the idea of Somerset again presented itself hen he fell asleep, his dreams repeated the scene at the play use: again he saw him, and again he eluded his grasp.

His waking thoughts were not less true to their object; and e next morning he went to a coffee-house in the lane, where called for breakfast, and inquired of the master if he knew ly thing of Sir Robert Somerset. The question was no oner asked, than it was answered to his satisfaction. The ourt Guide was examined, and he found his address, "Sir obert Somerset, Bart. Grosvenor-Square—Somerset Castle, —shire.—Derrhurst, C—shire."

Gladdened by the discovery, Thaddeus hastened home; and willing to affect the feelings of his friend by a sudden ap pearance, with an overflowing heart, wrote the following letter:

"To Pembroke Somerset, Esq. Grosvenor-Square

"Dear Somerset,

"Will the name at the bottom of this paper surprise you? Will it give you pleasure? I cannot suffer myself to retain a doubt, although you have by the silence of two years almost convinced me that I am forgotten. In truth, Somerset, I had resolved never to obtru' myself and my misfortunes on your knowledge, until last Wednesday night, when I saw you going into Drury-lane Theatre; the sight of you quelled all my resentment, and I called after you, but you did not hear. Pardon me, my dear friend, that I speak of resentment. It is a hard lesson to learn, that of being resigned to the forgetfulness of them we love.

"Notwithstanding that I lost my pocket-book with your direction, in a skirmish soon after your departure, I have written to you frequently at a venture; and yet, though you knew in what spot in Poland you left Thaddeus and his family, I have never heard of you since the day of our separation. Yet, you must have some good reason for your silence; at least I will hope so; and let me beg that I may either hear from you or see you directly on your receiving this.

"Doubtless, public report has afforded you some information relative to the destruction of my ever beloved country. I bear its fate on myself. You will find me in a poor lodging at the bottom of St. Martin's Lane. You will find me changed in every thing. The first horrors of grief have subsided, and my dearest consolation rises in the midst of my affliction, out of what was its bitterest cause: I thank heaven, that my revered grandfather and mother were taken from a consummation of ills, that would have reduced them to a misery which I am content to endure alone.

"Come to me, dear Somerset. To look on you, to press you to my heart, will be a happiness, that even in hope makes my heart throb with pleasure.

"I will remain at home all day to-morrow, in the expectation of seeing you; meanwhile adieu, my dear Somerset. You will find, at No. 5 St. Martin's Lane, your ever affectionate "Thaddeus Constantine Sobieski.

"Friday noon.

"P. S. Inquire for me by the name of Mr. Constantine."

the most delightful emotions Thaddeus sealed this nd gave it to Nanny, with orders to inquire at the ice when he might expect an answer. The child re-with the information that it would reach Grosvenor-in an hour, and he could have a reply by three o'clock.
e o'clock arrived, but no letter. Thaddeus counted rs till midnight, which brought him nothing but disapnt. The whole of the succeeding day wore away in e uncomfortable manner. His heart bounded at every t sounded in the passage, and throwing open his room listened to every person that spoke, but none bore emblance to the voice of Somerset.
again shut in, and the Count, overcome by a train of in which despondence had now the greatest share, imself on his bed, unable to close his eyes.
ever be our afflictions, not one human creature, who ared misfortunes, will hesitate to aver, that, of all the incident to mortality, there are none like the rackings nse. It is the hell which Milton describes with such accuracy: in its hot and cold regions the anxious soul s alternately tossed from ardours of hope to the petrigours of doubt and dread. Men who have not been ed between confidence and fear, in the faith of a be-iend, are ignorant of "the nerve whence agonies are
It is, when sunk in sorrow, when adversity loads us ers miseries, and our wretchedness is complete; it is feel, that though life is brief, there are few friendships ave strength to follow it to the end.
were the reflections of the Count Sobieski, when he the morning from his sleepless pillow. The idea that r might have been delayed, afforded him a faint hope, e cherished all day, clinging to the expectation of see-friend before sunset. But Somerset did not appear; addeus, obliged to seek an excuse for his absence in position that his application had miscarried, rather itily abandon himself to the belief that he was treated elty and ingratitude, determined to write once more, ver the letter himself at his friend's door, accordingly,
ferent sensations from those with which he had ad-
him a few days before, he wrote these lines:

"To Pembroke Somerset, Esq.

who once called Thaddeus Sobieski his friend, have received a letter which that exile addressed to him on Friday last, this note will meet with the same neglect. But if this be the first intelligence that tells Somerset his friend is in town, though robbed of all that he possessed, he will receive him with open arms at his humble abode in St. Martin's Lane.

"Sunday evening, No. 5, St. Martin's Lane."

Thaddeus having sealed the letter, walked out in search of Sir Robert Somerset's habitation. After some inquiries, he found Grosvenor Square; and, notwithstanding the darkness of the night, was directed to the house by the light of lamps, and the lustre that shone through the open windows. He hesitated a few minutes on the pavement, and looked up. An old gentleman was standing with a little boy at the nearest window. Whilst the Count's eyes were fixed on these two figures, he saw Somerset himself come up to the child, and lead it away towards a group of ladies.

Thaddeus immediately flew to the door, with a tremor over his frame which communicated itself to the knocker, for he knocked with such violence that the door was opened in an instant by half a dozen footmen at once. He spoke to one.

"Is Mr. Pembroke Somerset at home?"

"Yes," replied the man, supposing him to be a visitor, and making room for him to pass.

"I do not want to see him now," rejoined the Count, "only give that letter directly, for it is of consequence."

"Certainly, sir," replied the servant, and Thaddeus instantly withdrew.

He now turned homewards, with his mind more than commonly depressed. There was a something in the whole affair that pierced him to the soul. He had seen the house that contained the man he most warmly loved, but he had not been admitted within it. He could not forbear recollecting, that when his gates had opened wide as his heart to welcome Pembroke Somerset, how he had been implored by his then grateful friend, to bring the Palatine and the Countess, with their retinue, to England, where his father would be proud to entertain them as the preservers of his son. How different did he find the reality to all these professions. Instead of seeing the doors opened to welcome him, he had been allowed to stand like a beggar on the threshold, and had heard them shut against him, whilst the form of Somerset glided above him even as the shadow of his buried joys.

These discomforting retrospections on the past, and painful meditations on the present, continued to occupy his mind; till, passing over from Picadilly to Coventry street, he perceived a wretched looking man, almost bent double, accosting a party of people in broken French, and imploring their charity.

The voice and the accent being Sclavonian, arrested the ear of Thaddeus. Drawing close to the man, as the party proceeded without taking notice of his application, he hastily asked, "Are you a Polander?"

"Father of mercies!" cried the beggar, catching hold of his hand, "am I so blessed! have I at last met him!" and bursting into tears, he leaned upon the arm of the Count, who, hardly able to articulate from surprise, exclaimed, "dear worthy Butzou! what a time is this for you and I to meet! But come, you must go home with me."

"Willingly, my dear lord," returned he, "for I have none. I have begged my way from Harwich to this town; and have already spent two dismal nights in the streets."

"O, my country!" cried the full heart of Thaddeus.

"Yes," continued the poor old soldier, "it received its death wound when Kosciusko and my honoured master fell."

Thaddeus could make no reply; but, supporting the exhausted frame of his friend, who was hardly able to walk, he gladly descried his own door.

The widow opened it the moment he knocked, and seeing some one with him, was retreating, when Thaddeus, who found from the silence of Butzou and his increasing feebleness, that he was near fainting, begged her to allow him to take his companion into her kitchen. She instantly made way; and whilst the Count placed him in the arm chair by the fire, the poor man seemed at once bereft of sensation.

"He is my friend, my father's friend!" cried Thaddeus, looking at his pale and haggard face, with a strange wildness in his own features, "for heaven's sake give me something to restore him!"

Mrs. Robson, in dismay, and literally having nothing better in the house, gave him a glass of water.

"That will not do," exclaimed he, still upholding the motionless body on his arms; "have you no wine? nothing? He is dying for want."

"None, sir, I have none," answered she, frightened at the violence of his manner: "run, Nanny, and borrow some of Mrs. Watts."

"Do," said Thaddeus, "and bring me a bottle from the nearest inn." As he spoke, he threw her the only half guinea he possessed, and added, "fly, for he may die in a few minutes."

The child flew lightning over to the Golden Cross; and brought in the wine just as Butzou had opened his eyes, and was gazing at Thaddeus with a languid agony that penetrated his soul. Mrs. Robson held the water to his lips. He swallowed a little, and scarcely articulated, whilst his head dropped back on the chair, "I am perishing for want of food."

Thaddeus caught the bottle from Nanny, and pouring some wine into a glass, made him drink nearly all. This draught appeared to revive him. He raised himself up in his seat, and, though still panting and speechless, leaned his swimming head upon the bosom of his friend, who knelt by his side, while Mrs. Robson was preparing some toasted bread and mulled wine.

After much exertion between the good landlady and the Count, they sufficiently recovered the poor invalid to lead him up stairs, and lay him on the bed. The natural drowsiness attendant on debility, aided by the fumes of the wine, threw him into an immediate and deep sleep.

Thaddeus, seeing him at rest, thought it proper to go down to Mrs. Robson, and by a partial history of his friend, satisfy her about the cause of the scene that she had just beheld. He found the good woman surprised and concerned, but no way displeased; and in a few words he gave a summary explanation of the precipitancy with which, without her permission, he had introduced a stranger to her roof.

The substance of what he said, related, that the person up stairs had served with him in the army; that in consequence of the ruin of his country (which he could no longer conceal was Poland,) he had flown in quest of him in England; and in his journey had sustained those misfortunes which had reduced him to the state she had witnessed.

"I met him," continued he, "as a beggar in the street; and whilst he lives, I shall hold it my duty to protect him. I love him for his own sake, and I honour him for my grandfather's; besides, Mrs. Robson," cried he, with additional energy, "before I left my country I made a vow to my sovereign, that, wherever I should meet this brave old man, I would serve him to the last hour of his life. Therefore we must part no more. Will you give him shelter?" added he, in a subdued voice, "will you allow me to retain him in my apartments?"

"Willingly, sir! but how can I accommodate him? he is already in your bed, and I have got no other."

s that to me, best, kindest of women!" exclaimed
; "your permission has rendered me happy."
ı wished her a good night; and returning up stairs, himself in his dressing gown, and passed the night
le fire of the sitting room.

CHAPTER XIII.

to comfortable refreshment, and a night of quiet turbed sleep, general Butzou awoke in the morning
wered from the weakness which had subdued him ling day.
us observed this change with pleasure. Whilst he bed, ministering to him with the care of a son, he ı melancholy delight on his reverend features; and ı his languid voice, with those tender associations, tions of the heart, which are delicious, though they ith anguish.
ıe, my dear general," said he, "for I can bear to w; tell me what has befallen my unhappy country itted it?"
calamity," cried the brave old man, shaking his at tyranny could devise."
go on," returned the Count, with a smile that too ted the pretended composure of his air; "we, who ld her sufferings, and yet live, need not fear hearing ed! Did you see the king before he left Warsaw?
ıe that he was to be banished to Grodno some time month."
eplied Butzou, "our oppressors took care of that.
ıu, my lord, were recovering of your wounds in the ıet off for Sachoryn to join Prince Poniatowski. In hither, I met some soldiers, who informed me that ess had been compelled to discharge the troops, and ning to support his brother under the indignities, haughtiness of Suworrow might premeditate. I ted my steps towards Sendomar, where I hoped to rzecki, with a few faithful followers; but here too ppointed. Two days before my arrival that general rding to orders, disbanded the whole party. I now and was completely in the hands of her ravagers, pared to return. I was shocked and agonized at every step I retrod. I beheld the shores of the Vistula lined on every side with Russian troops. Ten thousand were posted on her banks, and eighteen thousand among the ruins of Prague and Villanow.

"When I approached the walls of Warsaw, imagine, my dear Count, how great was my indignation! How barbarous, how unmanly, the conduct of our enemies! Around the city batteries of cannon were erected, that on the least symptom of discontent were commanded to level it with the ground.

"On the morning of my arrival, I was hastening to the palace to pay my duty to the king, when a Russian officer intercepted me, and threatened that, if I attempted to pass, my obstinacy would be fatal to myself, and hazardous to his majesty, whose confinement and sufferings should increase in proportion to the adherents he retained among the Poles. Hearing this, I was turning away overwhelmed with grief and anger, just as the doors of the audience chamber opened, and the Counts Potocki, Kilinski, and several others of your grandfather's dearest friends, were led out under a strong guard. I was standing motionless with surprise, when Potocki perceiving me held forth his hand. I took it, and wringing it, in the bitterness of my heart uttered some words which I cannot remember; but the Russian bade me beware how I again gave way to such injurious warmth.

"'Farewell, my worthy general,' said the Count, 'you see that we are arrested. We have loved Poland too faithfully for her enemies; and for that reason are to be sent out of the way to-morrow to Petersburgh. Though we are prisoners, we shall at least have the consolation of sharing the same fate with Kosciusko.' 'Sir, I cannot admit of this conversation,' cried the officer of the guard; who commanding the escort to proceed, I lost sight of these illustrious patriots, probably for ever.

"I understood from the few Poles that remained in the citadel, the good Stanislaus was to be sent on the same dismal journey to Grodno the next day. And that you had quitted Poland the moment your wounds would allow you to move, that you might at least avoid the sight of Suworrow's triumphal entry, which happened on the ninth of November last. On the eighth, I believe, you left Warsaw for England?"

"Yes," replied the Count, who with a breaking heart had listened to this distressing narrative; "and, doubtless, I saved myself much misery."

"You did. One of the magistrates described to me the whole scene, at which I would not have been present for worlds. He told me that when the morning arrived in which the Russian was to make his public entry, not a citizen would be seen without compulsion. A dead silence reigned in the streets; the doors and windows of every house remained so closed, that a stranger might have supposed it to be a general mourning; and it was the bitterest that could have fallen upon our souls! At this moment, when Warsaw in a manner lay dying at the feet of the conqueror, the Russian troop marched into the city, and lined the roads, the only spectators of their own horrible tragedy. At length, with eyes that could no longer weep, the magistrates, reluctant and full of indignation, proceeded to meet Suwarrow and his train on the bridge of Prague. When they came near enough to the procession, they presented the keys of Warsaw on their knees."

"On their knees!" interrupted Thaddeus, starting up, and the blood flushing over his face.

"Yes," answered Butzou, "on their knees."

"Father of heaven!" exclaimed the Count, walking about the room with emotion, "why did not the earth open and swallow them? Why did not the blood which saturated the spot whereon they knelt, cry out to them? O Butzou, this humiliation of Poland is worse to me than all her miseries!"

"I feel as you feel, my lord," continued the general, "I expressed myself with the same resentment; but the magistrate who related to me the circumstance, urged in excuse for himself and his brethren, that such a form was necessary; and had they refused, probably their lives would have been forfeited."

"Well," inquired Thaddeus, resuming his seat, "but where was the king during this transaction?"

"In the castle: where he soon underwent a similar scene, and received orders to be present next day at a public thanksgiving, when all the inhabitants of Warsaw were forced to attend a te deum in gratitude for the destruction of their country. I thank Heaven I was spared from witnessing this monstrous blasphemy; I was then at Sendomir. The day after I heard these horrid accounts, I saw the carriage which contained the good Stanislaus, guarded like a traitor's out of the gates; and that very hour I left the country. I travelled towards Hamburgh, where I took my passage to Harwick. From fatigue, one of my old wounds broke out afresh, and, continuing ill a week, I expended the little money I had brought with me. Reduced to my last shilling, and eager to find you, I begged my way from that town to this. I had already spent two miserable days and nights in the open air, with no other sustenance than the casual charity of passengers, when Heaven sent you to save me from perishing in the streets."

Butzou pressed the hand of his young friend, as he concluded. Displeasure still kept its station on the Count's features. The good general observed it with satisfaction, well pleased that indignation at the supposed pusillanimity of his countrymen, prevented those bursts of grief, which he had expected from his sensible nature, when he should be informed that the ruin of Poland was confirmed.

Towards evening, general Butzou fell asleep. Thaddeus, leaning back on his chair, fixed his eyes on the fire, and pondered, with amazement and sorrow, on all that had passed. When it was nearly dark and he was yet lost in his musings, Mrs. Robson gently opened the door with a candle, in her hand, and presented a letter. "Here sir," said she, "is a letter a servant has just left; he told me there required no answer."

Thaddeus had sprung from his seat at the sight of the paper, and, almost catching it from her, his former gloomy cogitations dispersed before the hopes and fond emotions of friendship which now lit up in his bosom. Mrs. Robson had withdrawn. He looked at the superscription, it was the hand writing of his friend. Tearing it asunder, two folded papers presented themselves; he opened them and they were his own letters, which had been read and returned to him without a word. His beating heart felt suddenly chilled. Letting the papers fall from his hand, he dropped down on a seat, and closed his eyes, as if he would shut them from the world and its ingratitude.

Unable to recover from the astonishment into which this event had thrown him, his thoughts whirled about, in a succession of accusations, surmises, and doubts, that seemed for a few minutes to drive him to distraction.

"Was it really the hand of Somerset!"

Again he examined the envelope. It was; and the enclosure were his own letters, without one word of apology for such ingratitude.

"Could he make one? No," replied Thaddeus to himself. "Unhappy that I am to have been induced to apply twice to so despicable a man! Oh, Somerset," cried he, looking at the papers as they lay before him," was it necessary that insult must be added to unfaithfulness and ingratitude, to throw me off entirely? Good heaven! did he think because I wrote twice, that I would persecute him with applications? Well I have been told that this is mankind; but, that I should find it in him!"

In this way, agitated and muttering, and walking up and down the room, he spent another wakeful and cheerless night.

Next morning, when the Count went down stairs to beg Mrs. Robson to attend his friend till his return, she mentioned what uneasiness he had occasioned her the preceding night, as she had heard him most of the time moving above her head. He was accounting to her for his restlessness, by complaining of a head-ache that would not allow him to sleep, when she interrupted him by saying, "O no sir, I am sure it is the hard boards you lie on to accommodate the poor old gentleman. I am certain you will make yourself ill."

Thaddeus thanked her for her solicitude; but, declaring that nothing of the kind was any hardship to him, he left her; and, with his drawings in his pocket, once more took the path to Great Newport-street.

Indignation against his fickle friend, and anxiety for the tranquillity of general Butzou, whose age, infirmities, and sufferings, threatened a speedy termination of his life, determined the Count to sacrifice all false delicacy and weakness; and to hazard another attempt at acquiring the means of affording those comforts to the sick veteran, which his state demanded.—Happen how it would, he resolved that Butzou should never know the complete wreck of his property. He shuddered at loading him with the additional distress of feeling that he was a burthen on his protector.

Thaddeus passed the door of the print-seller who had behaved so ill to him on his first application; and, walking to the farthest shop on that side, entered it, and laying his drawings on the counter, requested the master to look at them.—The man opened the packet; and the Count, dreading a second repulse, or even more than similar insolence, hastily added:

"They are scenes in Germany. If you like to have them, their price is a guinea."

"Are you the painter, sir?" asked the man.

"Yes sir. Do they please you?"

"Yes," answered the man, examining them nearer, "there is a breath and freedom in the style which is novel and to take. I will give you your demand."

Thaddeus rejoiced that he had succeeded where he really felt no hope; and with a bow was leaving the shop, when the man called after him "Sir! Sir!"

Thaddeus returned prepared to hear some impertinent remark.

It is a strange thing, but it is true: that those who have been thrust by misfortune to a state beneath their birth and expectations feel as if they were the object of universal hostility. They see contempt in every eye, they suppose insult in every word: the slightest neglect is sufficient to set the sensitive pride of the unfortunate in a blaze; and alas! how little is this sensibility respected by the rich and gay, in their dealings with the unhappy! To what an addition of misery are the wretched exposed: meeting not only those contumelies which the prosperous are not backward to bestow, but those fancied ills, that however unfounded, keep the mind in a constant fever with itself and warfare with the surrounding world!

Repeated insults had taught the Count Sobieski to feel much of this anticipating irritability; and it was with a very haughty step that he turned back to hear what the print-seller had to say.

"I only want to ask, whether you follow this art as a profession?"

"Yes."

"Then I will be glad if you can furnish me with six such drawings every week."

"Certainly," replied Thaddeus, pleased with the probability of securing something towards the support of his friend.

"Then bring me another half dozen next Monday."

Thaddeus promised, and with a more satisfied mind took his way homewards.

Who is there in England that does not remember the dreadful winter of 1794, when the whole country lay buried in a thick ice that seemed eternal? Over that ice, and through those snows, the venerable Butzou had begged his way from Harwich to London; resting at night under the shelter of some shed or out-house. The effects of this was a painful rheumatism, that fixed itself in his limbs, and now rendered them nearly useless.

Two or three weeks passed over the heads of the general and his young protector; Thaddeus, cheering the old man with his smiles; and he, in return, imparting the only pleasure to him that his melancholy heart could receive; the con-

i that his attentions and affection were productive of rt.

he exercise of these duties, the Count not only felt his gradually recover its tone, but his mind become more il, and less prone to those sudden floods of regret and which had been rapidly sapping his life.

a strict economy on his own part, he managed to pay dow and support his friend, out of the weekly profits of wings, which were now and then augmented, by a com-n to do one or two more than the stipulated number.

s conversing with Butzou, reading to him when awake, ng his drawing when he slept, Thaddeus spent the ntil the beginning of March.

fine star-light evening in that month just before the roke up, after painting all day, he put on his hat, and g little Nanny to take care of the general, he left his at the print-seller's, and proceeded through Piccadilly, ing to go as far as Hyde-Park corner, and return.

h pleased with the beauty of the night, he walked on, marking that he had passed the turn-pike, till he heard
n. The sound seemed to come from near the Park.
He immediately hurried along, and came up with a who was struggling with a man that was swearing having in a very brutish manner.

hout a moment's hesitation, Thaddeus with one blow rm sent the fellow reeling against the wall. But whilst ported the outraged person who was fainting, the man red himself, and flying at her champion, aimed a stroke head, with an immense bludgeon, which the Count
g hold of as it descended, wrenched out of his hand.
orrid oaths of the ruffian, and the hysterical shrieks of man, soon collected a mob; when the villain, fearing usage, made off, and left Thaddeus to restore the ter-woman at his leisure.

oon as she was able to speak, she thanked her deliverer ice and language that assured him it was no common he had befriended. Though, in the circumstance of tress, all would have been the same to him; a helpless was insulted, and whatever were her rank, he felt that d an equal claim to protection.

mob dispersed; and the Count finding the lady capawalking, begged permission to see her safe home.

hank you, sir," replied she; "and I accept your offer ratitude. Besides, after your generous interference, it is requisite that I should account to you, how a woman of my appearance came out at this hour without attendance. I have no other excuse to advance for such imprudence, than the declaration that I have often done so with impunity. I have a friend, whose husband being in the guards, lives near the barracks. We often drink tea with each other, and sometimes my servants come for me; and sometimes when I am wearied and indisposed, I come away earlier, and alone. This happened to-night; and I have to thank your gallantry, sir, for my rescue from the first outrage of the kind that ever assailed me."

By the time that a few more complimentary words on her side, and a modest reply from Thaddeus, had passed, they stopped before a house in Grosvenor Place. The lady knocked at the door, and as soon as it was opened, the Count was taking leave, but she laid her hand on his arm and exclaimed:

"No, sir; I must not lose the probability of convincing you that you have not succoured a person unworthy of your kindness. I intreat you to walk in!"

Thaddeus was too much pleased with her manner, not to accept this invitation. He followed her up stairs into a drawing room, where a young lady was seated at work.

"Miss Egerton," cried the lady, as she entered and introduced the Count, "here is a gentleman who has this moment saved me from the hands of a ruffian. You must assist me to express my gratitude."

"I would with all my heart," returned she; "but your ladyship confers benefits so well, that you cannot be at a loss how to receive them."

Thaddeus took the chair that a servant set for him, and with mingled pleasure and admiration turned his eyes on the lovely woman whom he had rescued. She threw off her cloak and veil, and displayed a dignity of figure and pensiveness of countenance, full of such expression and interest, that he felt an irresistible wish to secure her acquaintance.

Her ladyship begged him to lay aside his great coat, as she must insist upon his supping with her. There was a commanding softness in her manner, and a gentle, yet unappealable decision in her voice, that he could not withstand: and he prepared to obey, although he was aware that the fashion and richness of his military dress concealed under his coat would give her ideas which his situation could not answer.

The lady did not notice that he hesitated, but ringing the bell, desired the servant to take the gentleman's hat and coat.

Thaddeus saw immediately in the looks of both ladies what he had feared.

"I perceive," said the elder, as she took her seat, "that my deliverer is in the army; yet I do not recollect having seen that uniform before."

"I am not an Englishman!" returned he.

"Not an Englishman," exclaimed Miss Egerton, "and speak the language so accurately! You cannot be French?"

"No, madam; I had the honour of serving under the king of Poland."

"Then his was a very gallant court, I suppose," rejoined Miss Egerton, with a smile; "for I am sorry to say, that there are few about St. James's that would have ventured to have done what you did by Lady Tinemouth."

The Count returned the young lady's smile. "I have seen too little, madam, of Englishmen of rank, to show any gallantry in defending this part of my sex against so fair an accuser." Indeed he recollected the officers in the park, and the perfidy of Somerset, and thought that he had no reason to give them more of his respect than their countrywoman considered fit to bestow.

"Come, come, Maria," cried Lady Tinemouth; "though no woman has less cause to speak well of mankind than I have, I will not permit my countrymen to be run down in toto. I dare say this gentleman will agree with me, that it neither shows a candid nor a patriotic spirit?"

"I dare to say he will not agree with you, Lady Tinemouth. No gentleman yet, who had his wits about him, ever agreed with an elder lady against a younger. Now, Mr. Gentleman! for it seems that is the name by which we are to address you; what do you say?"

Thaddeus almost laughed at the singular way she had chosen to ask his name; and allowing some of the gloom which generally obscured his fine eyes, to disperse, he answered with a smile.

"My name is Constantine."

"Well, you have replied to my last question first; but I will not let you off about my bearish countrymen. Don't you think, Mr. Constantine, that I may call them so, without any breach of good manners to them, or duty to my countrymen? For you see her ladyship hangs much upon patriotism."

Lady Tinemouth shook her head.

"O Maria, Maria, you are a strange mad-cap."

"I don't care for that; I will have Mr. Constantine's ver-prejudiced reply. I am sure, if he had taken as long a time in answering your call, as he does mine, the ruffian might have killed and eaten you too before he moved to your assistance. Come, sir, may I not say that they are bears?"

"Certainly. A pretty woman may say any thing."

"Positively, Mr. Constantine, I won't endure contempt! Say such another word, and I will call you as abominable an animal as the worst of them."

"But I am not a proper judge, Miss Egerton. I have never been in company with any of these men; so to be impartial, I must suspend my opinion."

"And not believe my word?"

Thaddeus bowed.

"There, Lady Tinemouth," cried she, affecting pet, "take your champion to yourself; he is too great a savage for me."

"Thank you, Maria," returned her ladyship, giving her hand to the Count to lead her to the supper room; "this is the way she quarrels with every man that comes into my house, and then her ill humour transforms them to its own likeness."

"And where is the man," observed Thaddeus, "that would not be happy under the spells of so beautiful a Circe?"

"It won't do, Mr. Constantine," cried she, taking her place opposite to him; "my anger is not to be appeased by calling me names; you don't mend the matter much, by likening me to a heathen and a witch."

Lady Tinemouth bore her part in the conversation of the evening, in a strain more in unison with the Count's mind However, he found no inconsiderable degree of amusement from the unreflecting volubility and giddy sallies of her friend; and on the whole, spent the few hours he passed there, with some resemblance to his almost forgotten sense of pleasure.

He was in an elegant apartment, he was in the company of two lovely and accomplished women, and he was the object of their entire attention and gratitude. He had been used to such scenes in his days of happiness, when he felt himself "the expectancy and rose of the fair state, the glass of fashion, and the mould of form, the observed of all observers." His re-appearance awaked, with tender remembrances, [illegible] feelings, that made him rise with regret, when [illegible] clock struck one.

Lady Tinemouth bade him good night, with an earnest request that he would shortly repeat his visit. This invitation gratified him much; and they parted mutually delighted with each other.

CHAPTER XIV.

Pleased as the Count was with the acquaintance to which is gallantry had introduced him, he did not repeat his call or a long time.

A few mornings after his meeting with Lady Tinemouth, he hard frost broke up. The change in the atmosphere so dreadfully affected the general, by producing a relapse of his rheumatic fever, that his friend had to watch by his pillow night and day for ten days. At the end of this period he recovered sufficiently to sit up and read, or to amuse himself by registering the melancholy events of the last campaigns, in a large book, with plans of the different battles. The sight of this volume would have distressed Thaddeus, had he not seen that it afforded comfort to the poor veteran, whom it transported back into the midst of scenes on which he delighted to dwell; yet he would often lay down his pen, shut the book, and weep like an infant!

The Count left him one morning at this employment, and strolled out, with the intention of calling on Lady Tinemouth. As he walked along by York House, he perceived Pembroke Somerset with a gentleman leaning on his arm, coming out of Bond-street.

All the blood in the Count's body seemed rushing to his heart. He trembled. The ingenuous smile on his friend's countenance, and his features so sweetly marked with frankness, made his resolution falter.

"But proofs," cried he to himself, "are absolute!" and turning his face to a stand of books that was near him, he stood there till Somerset had passed. He went by him speaking these words:

"I trust, father, that ingratitude is not his vice."

"But it is your's, Somerset!" murmured Thaddeus, as for a moment he gazed after them, and then proceeded on his walk.

When his name was announced at Lady Tinemouth's, he found her ladyship and another lady, but not Miss Egerton, Lady Tinemouth expressed her pleasure at this visit, and her surprise that it had been so long deferred.

"The pain of such an apparent neglect of your ladyship's goodness," replied he, "has been added to my anxiety for the declining health of a friend, whose increased illness is my apology."

"I wish," returned her ladyship, her eyes beaming approbation, "that all my friends could excuse their absence so well."

"Perhaps they might if they chose," observed the other lady, "and with equal sincerity."

Thaddeus understood the incredulity couched under these words. So did Lady Tinemouth.

"However," rejoined she, "be satisfied, Mr. Constantine, that I believe you sincere."

The Count bowed.

"Fie, Lady Tinemouth!" cried the lady, "you are partial; nay, you are absurd; did you ever hear a man speak truth to a woman!"

"Lady Sara!" replied her ladyship, with one of those arch glances that seldom visited her eyes, "where will be your vanity if I assent to this?"

"In the moon, with man's sincerity."

Thaddeus paid little attention to this dialogue. His thoughts, in spite of himself, were wandering after the figures of Somerset and his father.

Lady Tinemouth, whose fancy had not been quiet about him since chance had introduced him to her acquaintance, observed his present absence without noticing it. And, indeed, the fruitful imagination of Maria Egerton had not lain still. She declared, "he was a soldier from his dress, a man of rank by his manners, an Apollo by his person, and a hero from his gallantry!"

Thus did Miss Egerton describe him to Lady Sara Roos; "and," added she, "what convinces me that he is a man of fashion, he has not been within these walls since we told him that we should take it as a favour."

Lady Sara had been eager to see this handsome stranger. Having previously determined to drop in at Lady Tinemouth's under some excuse or other, every morning, till her curiosity was gratified, she was not a little pleased when she heard his name announced.

Lady Sara was married; but she was also young and beautiful, and she liked that her power should be felt by others besides her husband. The instant she beheld the Count Sobieski, she formed the wish to entangle him in her chains. She learned, by his pale countenance and thoughtful air, that he was a melancholy character, and, above all things, she had sighed for such a lover. She expected to receive, from one of that cast, a tenderness, a devotedness, in short, a fervent, wild and romantic passion, which would feed on her sighs and its lres to eternity. Thaddeus appeared to her to be the creature of whom she had been in search. His abstrac- his voice and eyes, the one so touching, the other so ctful of any thing but the ground, all were irresistible, he resolved from that moment (in her own words) "to a dead set at him."

ly Tinemouth, not less pleased with this second view of ew acquaintance than she had been at the first, directed scourse to him, accompanied by all that winning interest learing to a liberal heart. Whilst she was speaking, lara, who never augured well to the success of her fasci- is when the Countess addressed herself to any of her is, tried every means in her power to draw aside the at- n of the Count. She played with her ladyship's dog; ot succeeding, she determined to strike him at once with egance of her figure. Complaining of the heat, she threw arge green velvet mantle which she had on, and rising he chair, walked towards the window.

ien she looked round to enjoy her victory, she saw that nanœuvre had failed like the rest; for the provoking ess was still standing between her and Thaddeus. Al- ngry, she flung open the sash, and putting her head out, med, in her best modulated tones:

ow d'ye do?"

hope your ladyship is well this morning!" was answered, voice of Pembroke Somerset.

addeus grew pale, and the Countess feeling the cold, l round to ask lady Sara to whom she was speaking.

o a pest of mine, my dear," returned she, and then hing out her neck, she resumed, "but where, in the name ven, are you going, Somerset, with all that travelling atus?"

e Deerhurst; we are going to take lord Arun down. But your ladyship in the cold. Good morning."

y compliments to Sir Robert. Good bye! good bye!" vaiving her white hand till his curricle was out of sight, she turned round, her desires were gratified, for the ele- stranger was standing with his eyes fixed on that hand. ad she known, that for any cognizance they took of its , they might as well have been fixed on vacancy, she not have pulled down the window, and reseated herself uch an air of triumph.

e Count took his seat with a sigh, and lady Tinemouth e same.

"So that is the son of Sir Robert Somerset?"

"Yes," replied her ladyship, "and what do you think of him? He is called very handsome."

"Your ladyship has forgotten that I am near sighted," answered the Countess, "I could not discriminate his features, but I think his figure fine. I remember his father was a handsome man, and a man of wonderful talents."

"That may be," resumed lady Sara, laughing, and anxious to excite some emotion of rivalry in the breast of Thaddeus: "I am sure I ought not to call in question his talents and taste, for he has often wished that fate had reserved me for his son." Her ladyship sighed and looked down.

The sigh and gesture had more effect upon her victim, than all her exhibited graces. So difficult is it to break affection and habit, Any thing relating to Pembroke Somerset, could yet so powerfully interest the Count, as to stamp itself on his features; besides, the appearance of any latent disquietude, where all seemed splendour and vivacity, reminded him painfully of the chequered lot of man. His eyes were resting upon her ladyship, full of tender commiseration, pregnant with compassion for her, himself, and all the world, when she raised her head. The meeting of such a look from him, filled her with agitation. She felt something strange at her heart. His eyes seemed to have penetrated to its inmost devises. Blushing like scarlet, she got up, to hide an embarrassment not to be subdued; and, hastily wishing the Countess a good morning, curtsied to him, and left the room.

Her ladyship entered the carriage with feelings all in commotion. She could not account for the confusion which his looks had occasioned; and, half angry at a weakness so like a raw inexperienced girl, she had determined to become one of lady Tinemouth's constant visitors, until she should have brought him (as she had done most of the men about court) to her feet.

These were her ladyship's cogitations, as she rolled along towards St. James's Place. But she a little exceeded the fact in her statement; for, notwithstanding she could count as many lovers as any woman, both before and after marriage, yet few would have ventured so far as to trust the consequence of a kneeling petition. Somehow, the worthy lords and gentlemen had all to a man adopted the oracle of the poet, that,

"Love fleet as air, at sight of human ties, Spreads his light wings, and in a moment flies!"

all professed to adore lady Sara Capel; some were by her beauty, others by her eclat, but none had the stant wish to make this beauty and eclat his own legal y, young marquis of Severn fluttered round her ladyship the first year of his appearance about court; but at of that time, instead of offering her his hand, he mar- daughter of a rich city banker.
r Sara, who was at her father's house in the country, his intelligence arrived, was so incensed, that to show lain of the apostate lover, she set off the same evening tland with Harry Roos, the grandson of the duke of . They were married, and her ladyship had the of being presented to her majesty the same day with chioness of Severn.
first whirlwind of her resentment subsided, she began ismally to repent her union.—She loved captain Roos as she had loved lord Severn. She had admired the d gallantry of the one; and the profound adoration of er had made a complete friend of her vanity. But nce her revenge was gratified, the homage of Harry asing to excite the envy of her companions from the which he became her husband, she grew weary of ntions, and was very happy when the admiralty or- im to the command of a ship bound to the Mediter-

last fervent kiss which he imprinted on her lips, as eathed out the cold "Good bye, Roos, take care of f ?" seemed to her the seal of freedom; and she re- into her dressing-room, not to weep, but rejoice in the t of a thousand festivities and a thousand lovers.
at an early age without a mother, and ignorant of the f a wife, she thought that if she kept her husband and out of Doctors Commons, she should do no harm by herself with the heart of every man that came in her Thus she hardly moved without a train of admirers. already attracted every one worth the trouble; and ened to their compliments and insolent presumptions, was nearly tired of both; when Miss Egerton related he countess's rencountre with the gallant foreigner.
oon as her ladyship heard that he was of rank, (for gerton had not been backward to affirm the dreams of imagination,) she formed an earnest wish to see him en, to her infinite satisfaction, he did present himself, in her eyes he exceeded every thing that had been described. To secure such a conquest, she thought would not only raise the envy of the women, but make the men look about them to discover some novel and more attractive way than they had hitherto attempted to portray the extent of their devotion.

Whilst lady Sara was meditating on her new plans, the count and lady Tinemouth remained alone. Her ladyship talked to him on various subjects; but he answered ill upon them all, and sometimes very wide of the matter. At last, feeling that he must be burthensome, he arose, and looking even paler and more depressed than when he entered, wished her a good morning.

"I am afraid, Mr. Constantine, that you are unwell?"

Thaddeus, like most people who desire to hide what is passing in their minds, gladly assented to this, as an excuse for a taciturnity which he could not vanquish.

"Then," cried her ladyship, "I hope you will favour me with your card, that I may know where to send?"

Thaddeus was confounded, and looked down for a moment; then returning into the room, took up a pen which lay on the table, and said,

"I will write my address to a place from whence any of your ladyship's commands will reach me: but, I will do myself the honour to repeat my call very soon."

"I shall always be happy to see you," replied the countess while he was writing; "but, before I engage you in a promise of which you may afterwards repent, I must tell you, that you will meet with dull entertainment at my house. I see very little company; and were it not for the inexhaustible spirits of Miss Egerton, I believe I should become a complete misanthrope."

"Your house will be my paradise!" exclaimed the count, with an eagerness, to the force of which he did not immediately attend.

Lady Tinemouth smiled.

"I must warn you here, too," cried she; "Miss Egerton must not be the deity of your paradise. She is already under engagements that would preclude all hope on that head."

Thaddeus blushed at being mistaken, and wished to explain himself.

"You misunderstand me, madam, I am not insensible to beauty; but, upon my word, at that moment I had nothing else in my thoughts than gratitude for your ladyship's kindness to an absolute stranger.

at is true, Mr. Constantine; you are an absolute r, if the want of a formal introduction, and an ignof your family, constitute that title. But your protecroduced you to me; and there is something in your ape which convinces me, that I may not be afraid of ad-you among the scanty number of my friends."
ldeus immediately perceived the delicacy of lady Tinewho wished to know who he was, yet felt repugnant him pain by a question so direct that he must answer.
had proposed it, she left him entirely to his own dis-
; and he determined, as far as he could, without exhis real name and circumstances, to satisfy her very uriosity.
countess, whose benevolent heart was deeply inte-
i his favour, observed the changes of his countenance anxious desire that he would be ingenuous. Her so-did not arise from any doubt that she entertained of ity and worth, but she wished to be enabled to reply mptness to the inquisitive people who might see him ouse.
rdly know," said Thaddeus, "in what words to ex-
r sense of your ladyship's generous confidence in me;
: my character is not undeserving of such distinction, ust, will prove." He paused for a moment, and then
; "For my rank, lady Tinemouth, it is now of little nce to my comfort; rather, perhaps, a source of mor-
; for—" he hesitated, and then proceeded, with a ur tinging his cheek, "exiles from their country, if ld not covet misery, must learn to forget; hence I ther than Mr. Constantine; though in acknowledg-your ladyship's goodness, I deem it only just, that I ot conceal my real quality from you.
family was the first in Poland. Even in banishment, mbrance that its virtues were as well known as its fords some alleviation to the conviction, that when try fell, all my property and all my kindred, were in the ruins. Soon after the dreadful sealing of its uitted it; and by the command of a dying parent, ired in my arms, sought a refuge in this island, from ions, which otherwise, I could neither repel nor eus stopped; and the countess, struck by the grace-sty with which this simple account was related, laid upon his,

"Mr. Constantine, I am not surprised at any thing you have said. The melancholy of your air induced me to suspect that you were not happy; and my sole wish, in penetrating your reserve, was to show you that a woman can be a sincere friend."

Tears of gratitude and respect glistened in the Count's eyes. Incapable of making a suitable reply, he pressed her hand to his lips. She rose; and, willing to relieve a sensibility that delighted her, added, "I will not detain you longer, only let me see you soon."

Thaddeus uttered a few inarticulate words, whose significancy conveyed nothing, but every thing was declared by their confusion. The Countess's eloquent smile showing that she comprehended their meaning; and he left the room.

On his return home, he found general Butzou in better spirits, still poring over his journal. This paper seemed to be the representative of all which had ever been dear to him. He dwelt upon it, and talked about it, with a doating eagerness, bordering on insanity.

These symptoms increasing from day to day, gave his young friend considerable uneasiness. He listened with pain to the fond dreams which had taken possession of the poor old man, who delighted in saying, that much might yet be done in Poland, when he should be recovered, and they enabled to return to Warsaw, and stimulate the people to revolt.

Thaddeus at first attempted to prove the emptiness of these schemes; but seeing that contradiction on this head threw the general back into deeper despondency, he thought it better to affect the same sentiments; too well perceiving, that death would soon terminate these visions with his life.

Accordingly, as far as lay in the Count's power, he satisfied all the fancied wants of his revered friend; who, on every other subject was perfectly reasonable; but at last he became so absorbed in this chimerical plot, that even conversation, and his meals, seemed to oppress him with restraint.

When Thaddeus, with sorrow, perceived that his company was rather irksome than a comfort to his friend, he the more readily repeated his visits to Lady Tinemouth. She now looked for his entrance at least once a day. If ever a morning and evening passed away without his appearance, he was sure of being scolded by Miss Egerton, reproached by the Countess, and frowned at by Lady Sara Roos. This lady now contrived, in defiance of all other engagements, to drop in every night at Lady Tinemouth's. Her ladyship was not rprised at this sudden attachment of Lady Sara to e than pleased with her society, who, she found on acquaintance, could lay aside that tissue of affectafashion, which she wore in public, and really become ing woman.

gh Lady Sara was vain, she had sufficient sense to e with tolerable certainty into the characters of her tance. Most of the men with whom she had hitherto ed, having been jumbled together in those large as-where individuality is obsorbed in the general mass idity and ceremony, she saw that they were frivolous, least warped in taste and principle; and the fascinae used to subdue them, were the best suited to their
—her beauty, her thoughtlessness, and her caprice.
the reverse, when she formed the wish to entangle nan as Thaddeus, she soon discovered that to engage ition, she must appear in the unaffected graces of na-To this end she took pains to display the loveliness of on in every movement and position; yet she managed g with so inartificial and frank an air, that she seemed being present, who was unconscious of the versatility er of her charms. She conversed with good sense priety. In short, she appeared completely different e gay ridiculous creature, whom he had seen some efore in the Countess's parlour.
ow admired both her person and her mind. Her wintness, the vivacity of Miss Egerton, and the kindness ountess, beguiled him many an evening from the con-ion of melancholy scenes at home.
night, it came into the head of Maria Egerton, to ban-about his military dress. "Do for heaven's sake, my n Quixotte," cried she, "let us see you out of your mour! I declare I am tired of the sight. Somehow, nk you would be merrier out of that "customary suit in black."
demand was not pleasing to the Count; but he good edly replied, "I knew not till you were so kind as to ne, that a man's temper depends upon his clothes."
, I suppose," cried she, interrupting him, "you ave changed yours before? therefore I expect that you it as I bid you now, and put on a christian's coat
the next time you enter this house.
deus was at a loss what to say; he only bowed; and ntess and Lady Sara smiled at the nonsense.

When they parted for the night, this portion of the conversation passed off from all minds but that of Lady Tinemouth She had considered the subject, but in a different way from Maria. Maria supposed that the handsome Constantine wore the dress of his country because it was the most becoming. But as such a whim did not correspond with the other parts of his character, Lady Tinemouth, in her own mind, attributed this adherence to his national habit, to the right cause.

She remarked, that whenever she wished him to meet any agreeable people at her house, he always declined these introductions under the plea of his dress, though he never proposed to alter it. This conduct, added to his perfect silence on every subject that related to the public amusement about town, led her to conclude, that like the banished nobility of France, he was encountering the various inconveniences of poverty in foreign land. She hoped he had escaped its horrors; but she could not be certain, for he always shifted the conversation when it too closely referred to himself.

The observation haunted the mind of Lady Tinemouth, and made her anxious to contrive some opportunity in which she might have this interesting Constantine alone; and by a proper management of the discourse, lead to some avowal of his real situation. Hitherto her benevolent intentions had been frustrated by various interruptions at various times. Indeed, had she been actuated by mere curiosity, she would long ago have resigned the trial as fruitless; but sincere pity and esteem kept her still watchful till the very hour in which her considerate heart was fully satisfied.

One morning when she was writing in her cabinet, a servant informed her that Mr. Constantine was below in the parlour. Pleased at this circumstance, she took advantage of a slight cold that affected her, and hoping to be able to draw something out of him in the course of a tête-à-tête, begged that he would come up to her room.

When he entered, he perceived that she looked sadder than usual. He sat down by her and expressed his concern at her indisposition. She sighed heavily, but remained silent. Her thoughts were too much occupied with her benevolent plan to decide exactly what to answer. She had determined, in her reflections, to give him a cursory idea of her own unhappiness; and thus, by her confidence attract his.

"I hope Miss Egerton is well?" inquired Thaddeus.

"Very well, Mr. Constantine. A heart at ease almost ever keeps the body in health. May she long continue as happy this period, and never know the disappointment of her ls.

looked at the Countess.
; is true, my dear sir," continued she. "It is hardly ble that the mere effect of thirty-five years could have the inroads on my person which you see; but sorrow one it; and, with all the comforts that you see around am miserable. I have no joy independent of the few s which heaven has preserved to me; and yet," added
'I have another anxiety united with that of which I ain: some of my friends, who afford me the consolation tion, deny me the only return in my power, the office of g in their griefs.
ddeus felt the expression of her ladyship's eye, and the ness of her voice, as she uttered these words. He felt om the kind reproach was directed, and he looked down ed and oppressed. The Countess resumed.
annot deny what your countenance declares; you think you. I do, Mr. Constantine; I have marked your cholv: I have weighed other circumstances, and I am at you have many things to struggle with besides those which must ever hang about the bosom of a brave Forgive me, if I give you pain, (added she, observing ghtening colour,) I speak from a real esteem—I speak as I would to my own son, were he in your situation."
y dearest Madam," cried the Count, overcome by her lence; "You have judged right; I have many things ggle with; I have a sick friend at home, whom misforath nearly bereft of reason; and whose wants are now plicated and expensive, that never till now did I know mplete desolation of a man, without a country or a pro-
. For myself, Lady Tinemouth, adversity has few but for my friend, for an old man, whose deranged
s have forgotten the change in my affairs; who hangs for support and comfort: it is this that must account r ladyship for those inconsistencies in my manner and which are so frequently the subjects of Miss Egerton's
."
ideus, in the course of this short and rapid narrative, lly lowered the tone of his voice; and, at the close,
his face with his hand. He had never before confided ory of his embarrassments to any creature; and he twithstanding it had almost been petitioned from him, had committed an outrage on the firmness of his character, by in any way acknowledging the weight of his calamities.

Lady Tinemouth considered a few minutes, and then addressed him.

"I should ill repay this generous confidence, my young friend, if I were to hesitate a moment in forming some plan that may prove of service to you. You have told me nothing more, dear Mr. Constantine, than what I had already suspected. And I had something in view."—Here the Countess stopped, expecting that her auditor would interrupt her. He remained silent, and she proceeded, "You spoke of a profession, of an employment?"

"Yes, madam," replied he, taking his hand from his eyes, "I should be glad to engage in any profession or employment that you would recommend."

"I have little interest," answered her ladyship, "with people in power, therefore I cannot propose any thing which will in any way suit with your rank; but the employment I have in view, several of the most illustrious French nobility have not blushed to execute."

"Do not fear to mention it to me," cried the Count, perceiving her reluctance; "I would attempt any thing that is not dishonourable to render service to my poor friend."

"Well then, you would have no objection to teach languages?"

Thaddeus immediately answered, "None in the world."

"Then," replied her ladyship, greatly relieved by the manner in which he had received her proposal; "I will now tell you, that about a week ago, I paid a visit to Lady Dundas, the widow of Sir Hector Dundas, the rich East India Director. While I was there, I heard her talking with her two daughters, about finding them a proper master to teach them German. That language has become a very fashionable accomplishment among literary ladies; and Miss Dundas being a member of the Blue-stocking Club, you instantly flashed across my mind. Lady Dundas was making a thousand objections against the vulgarity of various teachers who the young ladies proposed; and I, deeming it a favourable opportunity, told her ladyship, that if she could wait a few days, I would sound a friend of mine, who I knew, if he would condescend to take the trouble, would be the most eligible person imaginable. Lady Dundas and the girls gladly left it to me, and I now propose it to you."

"And I," he replied, "with thanks, accept the task."

ıen I will arrange every thing," returned her ladyship, ıend you the results."
r half an hour's farther conversation, Lady Tinemouth ı more impressed with the unsophisticated delicacy and of the Count's mind. And he, more grateful than ut- ı could declare, left his respects for Miss Egerton, and s leave.

CHAPTER XV.

next morning, whilst Thaddeus was vainly explaining ɔoor old friend, that he no longer possessed a regiment e that he could order out to try the success of some ıvres which he had been devising, little Nanny brought a rom the coffee house, to which he had given Lady Tine- the direction. He opened it and found these contents:

y dear sir: So anxious was I to terminate the affair ıady Dundas, that I went to her house last night. I d it was a great obligation, that you would undertake uble to teach her daughters; and I insist, that you do any romantic ideas of candour, invalidate what I have I know the world too well not to be convinced of the f Dr. Goldsmith's maxim, 'if you be poor, do not seem you would avoid insult, as well as suffering.' ɔld Miss Dundas, that you had undertaken the task ıt my persuasion: therefore, I could not propose other han a guinea for each two lessons that she and her sis- ıld receive. They are rich enough for any expense; ɛy made no objections to my demand, besides present- enclosed by way of entrance money. Thus, I have all preliminaries, and you are to commence your first on Monday, at two o'clock; but before then pray let me u. Cannot you dine with us on Sunday? I informed 'gerton of as much of the affair as I thought necessary unt for your new occupation. In short, good girl as she ought it most prudent to set her and Lady Sara on the cent that I have the Dundasses; therefore, do not be on that head.
me to-morrow, if not before, and you will give real re to your sincere friend, ADELIZA TINEMOUTH, turday morning, Grosvenor place."

Truly grateful to the active friendship of the Count looking at the general, who appeared perfectly happy prosecution of his wild schemes, Thaddeus exclaimed self, "By this means I shall have it in my power to all the assistance your melancholy state requires."

On opening the enclosed which her ladyship menti found it to be a bank note for ten pounds. He felt fortable, both at the present, and its amount: not havi any service to earn it, he regarded the money more than as a bond of engagement. However he found th feelings, with many other painful repugnances, must moment be laid aside; and without farther self torn consigned the money to the use for which he was av Countess had intended it, namely, to provide himself English dress.

During these various reflections, he did not leav Tinemouth's letter unanswered. He thanked her s for her zeal, and declined dining with her next day, count of leaving his poor friend so long alone; but p to come in the evening, when he should be retired to r

This excuse was felt by none more than Lady San who, having heard from Lady Tinemouth on Saturda ing, that she expected the company of Mr. Consta dine on Sunday, had invited herself to be one of th She had now seen him constantly for near a month, her amazement found, that in seeking to entrap him, only ensnared herself. Every word he uttered, penet her heart; every glance of his eyes shook her frame li tricity. She had now no necessity to affect softness; and seducing passion, imparted to her voice and coun all its bewitching pathos.

Thaddeus was not insensible to the enchantmen this intoxicating power threw around her, but it did n as far as she intended. He felt she was a lovely wom might have affected his senses, had she been free, heart been as in happier days. He knew that she wa ried woman; and as he believed her to be a virtuous could not credit the evidence of his feelings, which wo often whispered to him the language which her wished to convey.

When Lady Tinemouth mentioned to Lady Sara Egerton, the great favour she had conferred on the M dasses, by prevailing on Mr. Constantine to under task of teaching them German, Lady Sara coul conceal her vexation. She was angry at the Count for his acquiescence, and hated Lady Tinemouth for having made the proposal.

Miss Egerton laughed at the scrape into which Lady Tinemouth had brought his good nature; and declared that she would tell him next day at dinner, what a mulish pair of misses he had presumed to manage.

It was the youngest of those misses, that excited Lady Sara's displeasure. Euphemia Dundas was pretty: she had a large fortune at her disposal; and what might not such united temptations effect on the mind of her favorite? Torn with jealousy, she caught at the mention of his coming to dinner on the morrow; and offering to be one of the party, resolved to put on all her charms, that she might make one more essay on the hitherto insensible soul of Thaddeus, before she beheld him enter scenes so likely to extinguish her hopes. Hopes of what? she never allowed herself to inquire. She knew that she never had loved her husband, that she now hated him, and was devoted to another. To be assured of a reciprocal passion in that other, she believed was the extent of her wish. Thinking that she held her husband's honour safe as her life, she determined to do what she liked with her heart. Her former admirers were now neglected: and to the astonishment and admiration of the graver part of her acquaintance she relinquished all those dissipated assemblies in which she had so recently been the brightest attraction, and secluded herself whole evenings by the domestic fireside of the Countess of Tinemouth.

Thus, whilst the world were admiring a conduct which they supposed would give a lasting happiness to herself and her husband, she was cherishing a passion in her bosom that might prove the destruction of both.

On Sunday evening, the Count Sobieski entered Lady Tinemouth's drawing room, just as Miss Egerton had seated herself before the tea equipage. At sight of him she nodded her head, and called him to sit by her. Lady Tinemouth returned the grateful pressure of his hand. Lady Sara received him with a palpitating heart; and stooped her head to remove something that seemed to incommode her foot; but this was only a feint to hide the blushes that were burning on her cheek. No one observed her confusion; so common is it for those who are the constant witnesses of our actions, to be the most ignorant of their expression and tendency.

Thaddeus could not be so completely uninformed. The frequent falling of her eye, when it met his; the unequivocal intonation of her voice, and sometimes the framing of her speech, often made him shiver. He gladly obeyed a second summons from the gay Maria, and drew his chair close to hers.

Lady Sara observed his emotion with a jealous pang that she could not conceal; and pulling her seat as far on the opposite side as possible, began in silence to sip her tea.

"Ye powers of gallantry!" suddenly exclaimed Miss Egerton, pushing away the table, and lifting her eye-glass to her eye. "I declare I have conquered! look, Lady Tinemouth; look Lady Sara! If Mr. Constantine do not better become this English dress, than his Polish horribles, drown me for a false prophetess!"

"You see I have obeyed you, madam," returned Thaddeus bowing.

"Ah! you are in the right. Most men do it cheerfully, when they know they will gain by the bargain. Now you look like a Christian; before you always reminded me of some stalking hero in tragedy."

"Yes," cried Lady Sara, forcing a smile, and ready to weep with mortification, "yes, and now he exhibits a striking resemblance to George Barnwell."

Maria, who did not perceive the anger and sarcasm couched under this remark, good humouredly replied.

"True, Lady Sara, but I don't care for his being in black: obedience was the thing I wanted, and I have it in his present appearance."

"Pray, Lady Tinemouth," asked her ladyship, seeking to revenge herself on his alacrity to obey Miss Egerton, the cause of which her jealousy misapprehended, "what o'clock is it? I have promised to be at Lady Sarum's concert by nine."

"It is not yet eight," returned the Coun'ess, "besides this is the first time that I have heard of your engagement. I had hoped your ladyship would have spent all this evening with us."

"No," answered Lady Sara, "I cannot;" and, ringing the bell, she rose.

"Bless me, Lady Sara," cried Miss Egerton, "you are not going? Don't you hear that it is only eight o'clock?"

Lady Sara, busying herself about tying her cloak, affected not to hear her, and told the servant who opened the door to order her carriage.

Lady Tinemouth, much surprised at the oddness of this precipitation, but far from guessing the cause, requested the count to see her ladyship down stairs.

"I would rather not," cried she, in a quick voice, and darting out of the room was followed by Thaddeus, who got up with her flying footsteps, just as she had reached the street door. He hastened past her, to assist her into the carriage, and saw by the light of the flambeaux her face streaming with tears. He had already extended his hand as she approached, when her ladyship, seeing who he was, instead of accepting, struck it down with her left hand, and whilst he stood motionless with astonishment, jumped into the carriage, and with an indignant tone ordered it to drive to Berkley Square. He remained stupified for a few minutes looking after her: then returned into the house, too well able to translate the meaning of all this petulance.

When he re-ascended the stairs, Lady Tinemouth expressed her wonder at this whimsical departure of her friend; but as Thaddeus (whose feelings were really disturbed) returned a vague reply, the subject ended.

Miss Egerton, who hardly thought two minutes on the same thing, sent away the tea-board, and sitting down by the count, exclaimed,

"Mr. Constantine, I hold it right, that no man should be thrown into a den of wild beasts, without knowing what kind of monsters he shall meet there. Hence, as I find that you have undertaken the taming of that savage, Lady Dundas, and her cubs, I must tell you what they are like. Will you hear me?"

"Certainly."

"Will you attend to my advice?"

"If I like it."

"Ha!" replied she, returning his smile with another, "that is just such an answer as I would have made myself, so I won't quarrel with you. Lady Tinemouth, will you allow me to draw your friends' pictures?"

"Yes, Maria, provided you don't make caricatures. Remember your candour is at stake; to-morrow, Mr. Constantine will be able to judge for himself."

"And I am sure he will agree with me. Now Lady Dundas, if you please? I know her ladyship is a great stickler for precedence."

Lady Tinemouth laughed, and interrupted her.

"I declare, Maria, you are a very daring girl. What do you not risk by giving way to this satirical spirit?"

"Nobody's love that I value, Lady Tinemouth; you know that I never daub a fair character. Mr. Constantine takes me on your credit; and if you mean Charles Montresor, he is as bad as myself, and dare not for his life have any qualms."

"Well, well, proceed," cried her ladyship, "I will not interrupt you again."

"Then," resumed she, "I must begin with Lady Dundas. In proper historical style, I shall commence with her birth, parentage and education.—First then, my father told me that he remembers her the maid of Mrs. Sefton, when her husband went out governor of Surat. And soon after their arrival, this pretty Abigail, by some means cajoled old Hector Dundas (who was then exercising the same command over some other Indian province) to marry her. When she came back to England, she coaxed her foolish husband to appropriate some of his ill-gotten riches to the purchase of a baronetcy. I suppose the appellation mistress put her in mind of her ci-devant servantship; and in a happy hour, he complied, and she became my lady. That over, Sir Hector had nothing more to do in this world. He was so good as to think so himself; and, to add to his former obligations, had the civility of walking out of it; for one night, whether he had been dreaming of his feats in India, I cannot affirm, but he marched out of his bed-room window and broke his neck.—Ever since that fortunate event, Lady Dundas has exhibited the finest parties about town. And though she is as vulgar as she is rich, somehow every body goes to see her; whether in compliment to their own taste, or her silver muslins, I don't know, for there are half a dozen titled ladies of her acquaintance, who, to my certain knowledge, have not bought a ball dress this twelve month. Well how do you like Lady Dundas?"

"I do not like your sketch," replied Thaddeus, with a secret sigh, that from such a woman he was to receive any obligation.

"Come, don't sigh about my veracity;" interrupted she; "I do assure you, I should have been more correct, had I been more severe: for, she is as ill-natured as she is vulgar, and as presumptuous as ignorant; in short, she is a fit mother for the delectable Miss Dundas, whose description you shall have in two questions. Can you imagine a pedant, a scold, and a coquette, in one woman? If you can, you have a foretaste of Diana Dundas. She is large and ugly, and thinks herself delicate and handsome; she is self-willed and ignorant, and believes she is wise and learned; for, unhappily, she has

d herself in among the Blue Stockings; and, to sum she is the most malicious creature breathing."
' dear Maria," cried Lady Tinemouth, laying her i her arm, and alarmed at the effect her high coloring ave on Thaddeus; "for heaven's sake, be temperate!
heard you so unbecomingly harsh in my life."
Egerton peeped archly in her face.
: you serious, Lady Tinemouth? You know I would c unbecoming in your eyes.—Come, shake hands with I will be more merciful to the gentle Euphemia, for I hat Mr. Constantine shall be her lover. Won't you?"
ie, resigning her ladyship's hand. Thaddeus shook
i. "I don't understand your Lord Burleigh nods; ane in words, when I have finished; for I am sure you mediately unclasp your heart to receive the sweet
. She is so tiny, and so pretty, that I never see her
: thinking of some gay little trinket, all over precious Her eyes are two diamond sparks melted into a and her teeth, seed pearl, lying between rubies. So or the casket; but for the quality of the jewel within,
you to make the discovery."
Egerton, having run herself out of breath, suddenly . Thaddeus, seeing that he was called on to say some-ade an answer that only drew upon him a new volley ry; which she continued with very little interruption, party separated for the night.
that the count thought himself secure of the means of it, he sent the next day to consult a physician respect-situation of the general. When Dr. Cavendish had d conversed with the venerable Butzou, he gave it as ion, that the malady had originated in grief.
n too well suppose that," replied Thaddeus.
en," rejoined the physician, "I fear, sir, that unless I something of its nature, my visits will prove almost
"
Count remained silent. The doctor resumed—ill be grieved if his sorrows be of a complexion so s not to be trusted to a man of honour; for in these vithout we have some knowledge of the springs of the s, we lose much time, and perhaps entirely fail in g a cure. Our discipline is addressed both to the body nd of the patient."
ideus perceived the necessity of compliance, and did no t any further hesitation.

"The calamities, sir, which have occasioned the derangement of my friend, need not be a secret; too many have shared them with him; his sorrows have been public ones. You must learn by his language, Dr. Cavendish, that he is a foreigner and a soldier; he held the rank of general in the king of Poland's service. Since the period in which his country fell, and he followed me to England, his wandering senses have approximated to what you see."

Dr. Cavendish paused for a moment, before he answered the Count; then fixing his eyes on the veteran, who was sitting at the other end of the room, busily forming the model of a fortified town, he said—

"All we can do, at present, sir, is to permit him to follow his schemes without contradiction, meanwhile strengthening the system with appropriate medicines, and lulling its irritation by gentle opiates. We must proceed cautiously, and I trust in heaven, that success will crown us at last."

When the doctor had written his prescription, and was preparing to go, Thaddeus offered him his fee; but the good Cavendish taking the hand that presented it, and closing it on the guinea, "No, my dear sir, said he, "real patriotism is too much the idol of my heart, to allow me to receive payment when I behold her face. Suffer me, Mr. Constantine, to visit you and your brave friend as a friend, or I never come again."

"Sir, this generous conduct to strangers—"

"Generous to myself, Mr. Constantine, not to strangers; I cannot consider you as such; for men who devote themselves to their country must find a brother in every honest breast. I will not hear of our meeting on any other terms."

Thaddeus could not immediately form a reply adequate to the sentiment which the generosity and philanthropy of the doctor had awakened. Whilst he stood incapable of speaking, Cavendish, with one glance of his penetrating eye, decyphered his countenance; and giving him a friendly shake by the hand, disappeared.

The count now took up his hat; and musing all the way as he went on the unexpected scenes we meet in life; disappointment where he expected kindness, and friendship where no hope could arise; he arrived at the door of Lady Dundas, in Harley street.

He was immediately let in, and with much ceremony ushered into a splendid library, where he remained in expectation of the arrival of his pupils. Before they entered, they allowed cient time to examine its costly furniture; its glittert cases, bird cages, globes, and reading stands, all vith burnished gilding; its plaster casts of the nine hich stood in nine recesses about the room, draperied

e net, looped up with artificial roses; and on each fine cut steel Rumford stove, were placed, on sandal lestals, two five feet statues of Apollo and Minerva.
eus had twice walked round these fopperies of learn-n the door opened, and Lady Dundas, dressed in a wrapper made of Indian shawls, swam into the apart-ihe neither bowed nor curtsied to the Count, who was when she entered, but looking at him from head to
, as she passed, "So you are come;" and ringing the d to the servant, in no very soft tones: "Tell Miss the person that lady Tinemouth spoke of is here."
rship then sat down close to the fire, in one of the ed chairs, leaving Thaddeus still standing on the spot had bowed at her entrance.
may sit down," cried she, not deigning to look at him, ing the fire; "for my daughter may not choose to half hour."
fer standing," replied the Count, who could have at the accuracy of Miss Egerton's picture, had he nosticated many disagreeables to himself, from the rs of which this was a specimen.
Dundas took no farther notice of him. Turning bloated countenance, (which pride, as well as high-ad swoln from prettiness into deformity,) he walked dow, and stationed himself there, looking into the l the door was again opened, and two ladies made earance.
Dundas," cried her ladyship, "here is the young is to teach you German."
eus bowed, the younger of the ladies curtsied; and other; not forgetting to accompany such condescena toss of the head, that the effect of undue humility done away.
t a servant was setting chairs round the table, on as painted the judgment of Hercules, Lady Dundas ened her lips.
', Mr. Thingumbob, have you brought any grammars, iers, and dictionaries, and syntaxes with you?"
he had time to answer her ladyship in the negative, ndas, with a frown, interrupted her mother.

"I wish, Madam, you would leave the arrangement of my studies to myself. Does your ladyship think that we would learn out of any book which has been touched by other people? Thomas," cried she to a servant, "send Stevens here."

Thaddeus silently contemplated this strange mother and daughter, whilst the pretty Euphemia paid the same compliment to him. During his stay he only ventured to look once at her sylphid figure. There was an unreceding something in her liquid blue eyes when he chanced to meet them, that displeased him; and he saw, that from the instant she entered the room, she had never ceased staring in his face.

He was a little relieved by the maid's putting the books on the table; and Miss Dundas, taking a seat, desired him to sit down by her and arrange the lessons. Lady Dundas was drawing to the other side of the Count, when Euphemia, suddenly whisking round, pushed before her mother, and actually elbowed her out, with this exclamation—

"Dear Mamma! you don't want to learn!" and she squeezed herself upon the edge of her mother's chair, who, very angrily getting up, declared that rudeness to a parent was intolerable from such well-bred young women, and left the room.

Euphemia blushed at this reproof more than at her conduct; and Miss Dundas added to her confusion, by giving her a second reprimand. Thaddeus, who pitied the evident embarrassment of the little beauty, to relieve her, presented to her the page in the German grammar with which they were to begin. This had the desired effect, and for an hour and a half they prosecuted their studies with close attention.

Whilst the Count continued his directions to her sister, and then turned his address to herself, Miss Euphemia, wholly unseen by him, with a bent head, was affecting to hear him, though at the same time she looked obliquely through her thick flaxen ringlets; and gazing with wonder and admiration on his face, as it inclined towards her, said to herself, "if this man were a gentleman, I should consider him the most charming creature in the world."

"Will your task be too long, Madam?" inquired Thaddeus; "will it give you any inconvenience to remember?"

"To remember what?" asked she; for in truth she had neither seen what he had been pointing at, nor heard what he had said about it.

"The lesson, Madam, that I have been proposing."

"Show it to me again, and then I shall be a better judge."

d as he was desired; and was taking his leave, when d after him:
r, Mr. Constantine, come to-morrow at two, I want icularly." The Count bowed and withdrew.
what do you want of him to-morrow, child?" asked ndas, "you are not accustomed to be so fond of im-nt."
mia knew very well what she was accustomed to be but not choosing to let her sister into her predilection ntemplation of superior beauty, she answered: "You Diana, that you often reproach me for my absurd to novel reading, and my repugnance to graver books;
vant to be, like you, a woman of great erudition;
that purpose, I will study day and night at the Ger-I can read all the philosophers, and be a fit compa-
my sister."
speech from Euphemia, (who had always been so an enemy to pedantry, as to affirm that she merely German because it was the fashion,) would have
d Miss Dundas to some suspicion of a covert design, not been in the habit of taking down such large of adulation, that where herself was the subject of n, she gave it full confidence. Euphemia, who seldom ered these doses but to serve particular views, seeing, esent case, that a little flattery was necessary, felt no tion in sacrificing sincerity to the gratification of Weak of understanding, she had fed on the works nation till her mind loathed all other kind of food.
tent with devouring the elegant pages of Burney,
nd Gunning, she had flown, with voracious appetite, herself on the "garbage" of any circulating library
n her way.
fects of such a taste were soon exhibited in her man-sing very pretty, she became very sentimental. She ike a wood nymph; and talked as if her soul were of love and sorrow; though neither of these emo-knew by experience; nevertheless, she was ever n of some ill-fated passion, fancying herself, at differds, in love with all the fine beaux about town.
s management, she kept faithful to her favorite print "love was a want of her soul!" As it was the rule e, it ever trembled on her tongue; ever introduced sion of any new attachment, (which usually hapree times a year,) to her dear friend, Miss Arabella

Rothes. Fortunately for the longevity of their mutual friendship, owing to the compulsion of an old uncle, this young lady lived in an ancient house, forty miles to the north of London. This last circumstance proved a pretty distress for their pens to descant on; and Arabella remained a most charming sentimental writing stock, to receive the catalogue of Miss Euphemia's lovers: indeed, that gentle creature might have matched every lady in Cowley's Calender with a gentleman. Every throb of her heart could have acknowledged a different master. First, the fashionable sloven, Augustus Somers, lounged and sauntered himself into her good graces; but his dishevelled hair, soiled linen, and dirty great coat, not exactly meeting her ideas of an elegant lover, she gave him up at the end of three weeks. The next object that her eyes fell on, as the most opposite to her former fancy, was the charming Marquis of Inverary. But here all her arrows failed, for she never could extract more than a how d'ye do? from him, through the long lapse of four months; during which time she continued as constant to his fine figure, and her own folly, as could have fallen to the lot of any poor despairing damsel. However, my lord was so cruel, so perfidious, as to allow several opportunities to pass, in which he might have declared his passion; and she told Arabella, in a letter of [redacted] sheets, that she would bear it no longer.

She put this wise resolution in practice, and had already played the same game with half a score, (the last of whom was a young baronet, who, having just skated himself into her heart, she was forming daily parties to see on the Serpentine,) when Thaddeus made his appearance before her.

The moment she fixed her eyes on him, her inflammable imagination was set in a blaze. She forgot his apparent subordinate quality in the nobleness of his figure; and once or twice that evening, whilst she was flitting about the sparkling cynosure of the dutchess of Orkney's masquerade, her thoughts hovered over the handsome foreigner.

She viewed the subject first one way and then another, and in her ever varying mind he was "every thing by turns, and nothing long;" but at length she argued herself into a belief that he must be a man of rank from some of the German courts, who having seen her somewhere, unknown to herself, had fallen in love; and persuaded lady Tinemouth to introduce him as a language master to her family, that he might be enabled to appreciate properly the disinterestedness of her disposition.

wild idea having once gotten into her head, received credence. She resolved, without seeming to suspect eat him as his quality deserved, and to deliver senti- his hearing that should charm him with her generosity cacy.

these chimeras floating in her brain, she returned rent to bed, and dreamed that Mr. Constantine had out to be Monsieur; had offered her his hand; and was conducted to the altar by a train of princes and es, his brothers and sisters.

woke the next morning from these deliriums in ecstacy, them prophetic; and taking up her book, began, luttering attention, to scan the lessons which Thaddeus red her to learn.

CHAPTER XVI.

following day at noon, as the Count Sobieski was over Cavendish square, to keep his appointment in street, he was met by lady Sara Roos. She had spo- h the M[illegible] Dundas the night before, at the masque- here she discovered the pretty Euphemia through the Eloisa; and her jealous and incensed heart could not nd the temptation of hinting at the captivating Abe- had elected to direct her studies. Her ladyship soon ed into the situation of Euphemia's heated fancy, v from her, without betraying herself, that she expected er master the following day. Lady Sara, stung to the mediately quitted the room; and in a paroxysm of intment, determined to throw herself in his way, as he their house.

this hope she had already been traversing the square s of an hour, when her anxious eye at last caught a his figure, proceeding along Margaret-street. Hardly support her tottering frame, shaken as it was with ntending emotions, she accosted him first; for he was straight onwards, without looking to the right or the n seeing her ladyship, he stopped and expressed his at their meeting.

ou really are pleased to meet me," said she, forcing a take a turn with me round the square; I want to ith you."

Thaddeus bowed, and her ladyship put her arm his; but remained silent for a few minutes, in evider sion. The count recollected that it must now be qu
He felt the awkwardness of making the Misses Dund and, notwithstanding his reluctance to appear impati lady Sara, he found himself obliged to say:

"I am sorry that I must urge your ladyship to ho with your commands, for it is already past the time ought to have been with the Misses Dundas."

"Yes," cried lady Sara, angrily, "Miss Euphemia as much; but, Mr. Constantine, as a friend, I must w against her arts, as well as those of another lady, wh do well to correct the boldness of her manner."

"Who do you mean, Madam!" interrogated Th surprised at her warmth, and totally at a loss to conje whom she alluded.

"A little reflection would answer you," returned sh ing to retreat from an explanation; yet stimulated double jealousy to proceed; "She may be a good g Constantine; and I dare say she is; but a woman t promised her hand to another, ought not to flirt wi
What business had Miss Egerton to com[redacted]you to English dress? But she must now se[redacted] danger conduct by your having presumed to obey her."

"Lady Sara," exclaimed the Count, much hurt speech, "I hardly understand you; yet I believe I m ture to affirm, that in all you have just said you are mi Who can witness the general frankness of Miss Ege listen to the candid manner in which she avows her ment to Mr. Montresor, and conceive that she posses thoughts that would not do her honour to reveal! And self," added he, "I trust the least of my faults is presu
It never was my character to presume on any lady's cension; and if dressing as she desired be deemed an i of that kind, I can declare upon my word that had I other motives besides her raillery, my appearance sho have suffered any change."

"Are you sincere, Mr. Constantine?" cried Lady Sa smiling with pleasure. "Indeed I am; and happy explanations have met with your ladyship's approbat

"Mr. Constantine," resumed she, "I have no mot one in my discourse with you—friendship;" and cast eyes down, she sighed profoundly.

"Your ladyship does me honour."

"I would have you regard me with the confidence that you pay Lady Tinemouth. My father possesses the first patronage in this country; therefore I have it a thousand times more in my power than she has to render you a service."

Here her ladyship overshot herself; she had not calculated well on the nature of the mind that she wished to ensnare.

"I am grateful to your generosity," replied Thaddeus, "but on this head I must decline your kind offices. Whilst I consider myself the subject of one king, though he be in a prison, I will not accept of any employment under another that is in alliance with his enemies."

Lady Sara discovered her error the moment he had made his answer; and, in a disappointed tone, exclaimed:

"Then you despise my friendship!"

"No, Lady Sara, it is an honour far beyond my merits; and my gratitude to Lady Tinemouth must be doubled, when I recollect that I must possess it through her means."

"Well," cried her ladyship, "have that as you will; but I expect as a specimen of your confidence in me, that you will be wary of Euphemia Dundas. I know that she is artful and vain; and finds her amusement in attracting the affections of different men [redacted]then, notwithstanding her affected sensibility, she turn[redacted]n into a subject for laughter."

"I thank your ladyship," replied the count; but in this respect I think I am safe, both from the lady and myself."

"How!" asked Lady Sara, rather too eagerly, "is your heart!"—She paused and looked down.

"No, Madam," replied he, sighing as deeply as herself, but with his thoughts far from her and the object of their discourse, "I have no portion of my heart to give to love. Besides, the quality in which I appear at Lady Dundas's, would preclude the vainest man alive from supposing that such behaviour in any one to him could be possible: therefore, I am safe; though I acknowledge my obligation to your ladyship's caution."

Lady Sara was satisfied with the first part of this answer. It declared his heart unoccupied; and as he had admitted her professed friendship, she doubted not, but that when assisted by more frequent displays of her fascinations, she could destroy his lambent nature, and in the end light up in his bosom a similar fire to that which consumed her own.

The almost unconscious object of all these desires, began internally to accuse his vanity of being too fanciful in the formation of suspicions, which, on a former occasion, he had believed himself forced to receive; and, blushing at a quickness of perception that his contrition denominated a weakness, he found himself at the bottom of Harley-street.

Lady Sara called her servant to walk nearer to her; and, telling Thaddeus she should expect to meet him the next evening at Lady Tinemouth's, wished him a good morning.

He was certain that he must have staid at least half an hour beyond the time when he had promised to be with the sisters. Anticipating very haughty looks, and perhaps a reprimand, he knocked at the door, and was again shown into the library. Miss Euphemia was sitting alone.

The count offered some indistinct excuse for having made her wait; but Euphemia, with a good humoured alacrity, interrupted him:

"O pray don't mind; you have made nobody wait but me, and I can easily forgive it; for mamma and my sister chose to go out at one, it being May-day, to see the chimney sweepers dine at Mrs. Montague's. They did as they liked, and I preferred staying at home to repeat my lesson.

Thaddeus thanked her for her indulgence; sat down, and taking the book, began to question her. Not one word could she recollect. She smiled.

"I am afraid, Madam, you have never thought of it since yesterday morning!"

"Indeed I have thought of nothing else; you must forgive me; I am very stupid, Mr. Constantine, at learning languages, and German is so harsh at least to my ears! Cannot you teach me any other thing? I should like to learn of you above all things; but do think of something else besides this odious jargon! Cannot you teach me how to read poetry elegantly? Shakespeare, for instance; I doat upon Shakespeare!"

"That would be strange presumption in a foreigner."

"No presumption in the least," cried she; "if you can do it, pray begin! There is Romeo and Juliet."

Thaddeus pushed away the book with a smile.

"I cannot do it. I understand him with as much ease as you, Madam, will soon do German, if you apply! but I cannot pretend to read him aloud."

"Dear me, how vexatious! But I must hear you read something. Do take up that Werter: My sister got it from the Prussian embassador; and he tells me it is sweetest in its own language."

The Count opened the book. "But you will not understand a word of it."

"I don't care for that; I have it by heart in English, and only read his last letter to Charlotte, I know I can in my own mind."

se this whimsical little creature, Thaddeus turned er, and read it forward with a pathos that was nas voice and character. When he came to an end, the volume, the cadence of his tones, and the lady's lid ample justice to her sensibility.—She looked up, ag through her watery eyes, which glittered like t with dew, she drew out her perfumed handkerwiping them, said:
k you, Mr. Constantine. You see, by this irrepresion, that I can feel Goethe, and did not ask you a ur."
us bowed, for he was at a loss as to what kind of a d be expected by such a strange creature.
tinued:
ure a German, Mr. Constantine. Did you ever see
?"
Madam."
sorry for that; I should have liked to have heard of a beauty she was. But don't you think she beel to Werter? Perhaps you know him?"
fadam, this lamentable story happened before I was unhappy for him! I am sure you would have made harming friends in the world! Have you a friend, tantine.

unt looked at her with surprise. She laughed at ssion of his countenance.
't mean such friends as one's father, mother, and re-nost people have enough of them. I mean a tender friend, to whom you unbosom all your secrets; who her self, a second soul! In short a creature in whose you forget your own?"
us followed with his eyes the heightening colour of nthusiast; who, accompanying her rhapsody with pressive as her words, had to repeat her question, u such a friend?" before he found recollection to r in the negative.
unt, who had never been used to such extravagant in a woman, would have regarded Miss Euphemia
s little better than insane, had he not been prepared gerton's description; and he now acquiesced in her desire, to detain him another hour, half amused, and half wearied with her aimless and wild fancies. But here he was mistaken, her fancies were not aimless; his heart was the game that she had in view, and she determined that a desperate attack should make it hers, in return for the deep wound which she had received from every tone of his voice, while reading the Sorrows of Werter.

Thaddeus spent a fortnight in the constant exercise of his occupations. In the mornings, till two, he prepared those drawings, by the sale of which, he was empowered to pay the good Mrs. Robson, for the care of his friend. And he hoped, that when the ladies in Harley-street should think it time to defray any part of their now large debt to him, he might be enabled to liquidate the very long bill of his friend's apothecary. But the Misses Dundas possessed too much money to think of its utility; they used it as counters; for they had no conception, that to other people, it became the source of almost every comfort. Their comforts came so certainly, that they supposed they grew out of necessity of their situation; and, that their great wealth owned no other commission, than to give splendid parties and buy fine things.—Their golden showers being exhaled by the same power of vanity by which it had been shed, they as little regarded its dispersion as they had marked its source.

Hence, these amiable ladies never once recollected that their master ought to receive some weightier remuneration for his visits, than the honour of paying them; and as poets tell that all honours are achieved by much hardihood, so these two sisters, though in different ways, seemed resolved that Thaddeus should purchase his distinction with adequate pains.

Notwithstanding, Miss Dundas continued very remiss in her lessons, she, unrelentingly, required the Count's attendance; and sometimes not in the most gentle language, reproached him for a backwardness, which she owed entirely to her own inattention and stupidity. The fair Diana would have been the most learned woman in the world, could she have found any fine lady path to the temple of science; but the goddess who presides there, being only won by arduous climbing, poor Miss Dundas, like the indolent monarch that made the same demand on the philosophers, was obliged to lay the fault of her own slippery feet to the weakness of her conductors.

As Thaddeus dispised her most heartily, he bore ill humour from that quarter with perfect equanimity. But the pretty Euphemia was not easily managed; she had now completely given up her soul to this fancied prince in disguise; and already began to act a thousand extravagancies. Diana, without suspecting the object, soon discovered that she was in one of her love fits. Indeed she cared nothing about it; and leaving her to pursue the passion as she liked, poor Euphemia, according to her custom when labouring under this whimsical malady, addicted herself to solitude. This romantic taste she generally indulged, by taking her footman to the gate of the green in Cavendish Square, where he stood till she had performed a pensive saunter up and down the walk. After this she returned, adjusted her hair in the Madonna fashion, because the Count had one day admired the female head in a holy family, by Guido, over the chimney-piece; then seating herself in some becoming attitude, usually waited, with her eyes constantly turned to the door, till the object of all these pains presented himself. She impatiently watched all his motions and looks, whilst he attended to her sister; and the moment he was done, ran over her own lessons with greater volubility than clearness. This finished, she shut the books, and employed the remainder of the time in translating a number of little mottos into German, which she had composed for boxes, baskets, and other frippery.

One day, when the Count, as usual, was tired to death with making decent sense out of so much nonsense; Euphemia, observing that Diana was at the other end of the room with the honourable Mr. Lascelles, (for Miss Dundas, to give an eclat to her new studies, had lately opened her library door to morning visitors,) thought that she might do what she wished without detection; and, hastily drawing a folded paper from her pockets, she desired Thaddeus to take it home and translate it into what language he liked.

The Count surprised at her manner, held it in his hand.

"Put it in your pocket," added she, in a hurrying voice, "else my sister will see it, and ask what it is!"

Thaddeus, full of wonder, obeyed her; and the little beauty, having executed her scheme, seemed quite intoxicated with delight. When he was preparing to withdraw, she called to him, and asked him when he should see Lady Tinemouth.

"This evening, Madam."

"Then," returned she, "tell her ladyship that I shall come and sit half an hour with her to-night; and here," added she, running up to him, "present her that rose, with my love." Whilst she put it into his hand, she whispered in a low voice:

and you will tell me what you think of those verses I have given you?"

Thaddeus blushed, and bowed. He hurried out of the house into the street, as if by that means he could altogether have gotten out of a dilemma to which he feared all this foolish mystery of Euphemia was only the introduction.

Though the Count Sobieski was of all men in the world, perhaps the least inclined to vanity: yet he must have been also the most stupid, if he had not been convinced by this time, of the criminal attachment of Lady Sara. Added to this disagreeable certainty, he more than half dreaded a similar folly in Miss Euphemia.

Can a man see himself the daily object of a pair of melting eyes; hear everlasting sighs at his entrance and departure; day after day, receive tender, though covert addresses, about disinterested love; can he witness all this, and be sincere, when he affirms, that it is the language of indifference? If that be possible, the Count Sobieski had no pretensions to modesty. He comprehended the discoursing of Miss Euphemia's 'eye,' also the tendency of the love-sick mottos which, under various excuses, she put into his hand; and with many a smile, mixed with pity, he contemplated her childish absurdity.

A few days prior to that in which she made this appointment with the Count, she presented to him another of her devices, which ran thus:—"Frightened love, like a wild beast, shakes the wood in which it hides."

Thaddeus nearly laughed at the oddity of this conceit.

"Do, dear Mr. Constantine," cried she, "translate it into the sweetest French you can, for I mean to have it put into a medallion, and give it to the person I most value on earth!"

There was something so truly ridiculous in the sentence, that he felt reluctant to allow even Miss Euphemia to expose herself so far; and considering a moment how he should make any thing so bad better, he said, "I am afraid I cannot translate it literally; but surely, madam, you can do it yourself!"

"Yes, but I like your French better than mine! so set about it."

He had done the same kind of thing a hundred times, and, without farther parley, wrote as follows:

"L'amour, tel qu'une biche blesse, se trahit lui meme par sa crainte, qui, fait remuer le feuillage qui le couvre."

"Bless me how pretty!" cried she, and immediately put it into her bosom, unlucky addition of the words se trahit hui meme, was indebted for the present of the folded paper. working imagination of Euphemia, in a moment inserted thought as a delicate avowal, that he was led deer which he had substituted in the place of the ; and as soon as he arrived at home, he found the er mistake, in the packet which she had given him uch secrecy.

he broke the seal, something dropped out and fell on . He took it up and blushed like scarlet, on finding a allion, with the words that he had altered for Miss , engraved on blue enamel. With an agitated next looked at the envelope; it contained a copy of th this line written at the top.

"To him who will apply them."

using farther, he found them to be Mr. Addison's translation of that of Sappho which runs:

Blest as the immortal gods is he,
The youth who fondly sits by thee,
And hears and sees thee all the while,
Softly speak and sweetly smile.

'Twas this deprived my soul of rest,
And raised such tumults in my breast,
For while I gazed in transport tost,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost.

My bosom glow'd; the subtle flame
Ran quick through all my mortal frame;
O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung;
My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

In dewy damps my limbs were chill'd;
My blood with gentle horrors thrill'd!
My feeble pulse forgot to play,
I fainted, sunk, and died away!

"EUPHEMIA."

Thaddeus threw both them and the medallion together on and sat for a few minutes, considering how he extricate himself from an affair so truly farcical.

He was thinking of at once giving up the task of attendin either of the sisters, when his eyes falling on the uncomplain ing but melancholy features of his poor friend, he exclaime "No, for thy sake, gallant Butzou, I will brave every scen however repugnant to my feelings!"

Well aware from observations on Miss Euphemia, that th seeming tenderness, which had prompted an act so wild an unbecoming, originated in mere caprice, he felt no hesitation i determining to return the things in as handsome a manner a possible, and by so doing at once crush the whole affair. H experienced no pain when forming these resolves; becaus he saw that not one impulse of her conduct had any thing t do with her heart. It was a whim lit up by him to day which might be extinguished by another to-morrow.

But how different was the case with regard to Lady Sara her uncontrolled nature could not brook the restraints o friendship. Every attention that he gave to Lady Tino mouth, every civility that he paid to Miss Egerton, or to any other lady whom he met at the Countess's, went like a dagge to her soul; and whenever she could gain his ear in private she generally made him sensible of her misery, and his own unhappiness in being its cause, by reproaches which too unequivocally proclaimed their source.

He now saw that her ladyship had given way to a danger ous and headstrong passion: and allowing for the politeness which is due from his sex, he tried by an appearance of the most stubborn coldness, and obstinate perversity in shutting his apprehension against all her speeches and actions, to stem a tide that threatened her with the loss of peace.

Lady Tinemouth at last began to open her eyes to the perilous situation of both her friends. Highly as she esteemed Thaddeus she knew not the extent of his integrity.

She had lived too long about the court of Britain, and seen too many from the courts of the continent, to place much reliance on the honour of a single and unattached young man, when assailed by rank, beauty and love.

Alarmed at what might be the result of her observations, and fearing to lose any time, she had that very evening, in which she expected the count to supper, drawn from Lady Sara the unhappy state of her heart.

The dreadful confession was made by her ladyship with repeated showers of tears, and in paroxysms of agony which pierced the countess to the soul.

"My dear Lady Sara," cried she, "for heaven's sake remember your duty to Captain Roos!"

"I shall never forget it!" exclaimed her ladyship, sinking her head mournfully, and striking her breast with her clenched hand; "I never look on the face of Constantine, that I do not execrate from my heart the vows which I have sworn to him; but I have bound myself his property; and though I hate him, whatever it may cost me, I will never forget that my faith and honour are my husband's."

Lady Tinemouth, with a countenance bathed in tears, put her arms around the waist of Lady Sara, who now sat motionless, with her eyes fixed on the fire.

"Dear Lady Sara! that was spoken like yourself. Do more abstain from seeing Mr. Constantine."

"Don't ask me that!" cried her Ladyship, "I could easier rid myself of existence. He is the very essence of my happiness. It is only in his company I forget I am a wretch."

"This is obstinacy, Lady Sara! this is courting danger."

"Lady Tinemouth, urge me no more on the subject. Is it not enough," continued she sullenly, "that I am miserable! Would you drive me to desperation? If there be danger, you brought me into it."

"I!"

"Yes, you, Lady Tinemouth; you introduced him to me."

"But you are married. Handsome and amiable as he is, could I suppose—"

"Nonsense!" cried her ladyship, interrupting her, "you know that I am married to a mere fool! But it is not because Mr. Constantine is handsome that I like him. No, though no human form can come nearer to perfection, yet it was not that; it was you. You and Maria Egerton were always telling me of his bravery; what wealth and honors he had sacrificed in the service of his country; how nobly he succoured the distresses of others; how heedless he was of his own. This fired my imagination and won my heart. No, it was not beauty; I am not so despicable!"

"Dear Lady Sara, be calm!" continued her ladyship, completely at a loss how to manage a spirit whose violence exceeded her conception." "Think, my dear friend, what horrors you would experience if Mr. Constantine were to discover this predilection of yours, and presume upon it. You know where even the best of men are vulnerable."

The eyes of Lady Sara sparkled with pleasure at this surmise of the countess's.

"Why, surely, Lady Sara!" exclaimed Lady Tinemouth, doubtingly.

"Don't fear me, Lady Tinemouth; I know my own dignity too well to do any thing disgraceful; yet I would acquire the knowledge that he loves me at almost any price. But he is cold," added she, sinking again into despondence; "he is a piece of obstinate petrifaction which heaven itself could not melt!"

Lady Tinemouth was glad to hear this account of Thaddeus. She began to take a little confidence from his side just as the drawing room door was opened, and Miss Euphemia Dundas was announced.

Lady Sara gave the little beauty such a withering look, when she expressed her amazement at not seeing Mr. Constantine, who was to have apprised the countess of her intended visit, that, had her ladyship's eyes been Medusean for that moment, poor Euphemia would ever after have represented a stone statue of disappointment.

Meanwhile, the count having seen Dr. Cavendish, and received a favourable account of his friend, wrote the following note to Miss Euphemia, and then arranged his dress before he proceeded to Grosvenor Place.

"To Miss Euphemia Dundas.

"Mr. Constantine very much admires the taste of Miss Euphemia Dundas in the choice of the verses which she did him the honour of requesting he would translate into the most appropriate language; and he has, to the utmost of his abilities, obeyed her commands in Italian, thinking it the best adapted, both for versification and the subject.

"Mr. Constantine equally admires the style of the medallian which Miss E. Dundas condescended to enclose for his inspection, and assures her the letters are perfectly correct."

When the count entered Lady Tinemouth's drawing room, he saw that his young enamorata had already arrived, and was in close conversation with the countess. Lady Sara, now that the discovery was made, thought it unnecessary to put any restraint on her temper before her ladyship. Seating herself alone on a sofa, she was inwardly upbraiding Constantine for what he had termed an absolute assignation with Euphemia, when his name was announced.

Her half resentful eyes, yet swimming in the tears her discourse with Lady Tinemouth had awakened, sought his face, which was regarding Miss Dundas with a look of and disgust. This pleased her; and the more so as slightly bowed to her rival, shook the countess by the id then returning, took his station beside her on the sofa. ould not trust her triumphant eyes to wander towards Tinemouth, but immediately asked him some trifling t. At the same moment, Euphemia tapped him on with her fan, and inquired how it happened that she ved first.

aswered Lady Sara. Euphemia impatiently repeating and, "how did it happen that I arrived here first?" ose, madam," replied he, "because you set out first. I elieve that I am ever with Lady Tinemouth much be- at, and now it wants five minutes of that hour. But, en so fortunate as to have preceded you, I should cer- ave delivered the message with which I was honoured." vening passed off more agreeably to the count than he ured from the scene that presented itself on his en- Lady Sara always gave him pain; Miss Euphemia im to death; but to-night, the storm which had agitated st of her ladyship, having subsided into thoughtfulness, d so abstracted an air to her ever-loving countenance, ieski, merely to elude communication with Euphemia, d near her: and by paying those attentions, which he t avoid, he so deluded the wretched Lady Sara, as to her melancholy into that enchanting softness, which l her the most captivating of women.

ıly person present who did not approve the change, ly Tinemouth. At every dissolving smile of her Cir- lyship, she beheld the intoxicating cup at the lips of ıs, and dreaded its effect. Euphemia was too busily d repeating some new poems, and too intensely dream- hat her tutor might say on the verses and medallion, to the dangerous ascendency which the superior charms y Sara might acquire over the breast of Constantine. she had no suspicion of finding a rival in her ladyship; en a servant announced the arrival of her mother's nd she saw by her watch that it was twelve o'clock, reluctantly, exclaiming, ıre say, some plaguing people have arrived who are with us, else mamma would not have sent for me so ll it late," said Lady Sara, who would not lose an opportunity of contradicting her, "so I will thank you, Mr. Constantine," addressing herself to him, "to hand me to my coach at the same time."

Euphemia bit her lips at this movement of her ladyship, and followed her down stairs reddening with anger. She got into her carriage, but would not suffer the servant to close the door till she had seen lady Sara seated in hers; then calling to Mr. Constantine, she desired him to come into the coach.

Lady Sara leaned her head out of the window. As she saw the man she loved step into Lady Dundas's carriage, she in her turn almost bit her lips through with vexation.

"Home, my lady?" asked the servant, touching his hat.

"No, not till Miss Dundas's coach drives on."

Miss Euphemia had desired Thaddeus to come in for a moment; and he reluctantly obeyed.

"Mr. Constantine," cried the little beauty, trembling with expectation, "have you opened the paper that I gave you?"

"Yes, Madam," returned he, holding the door open, and widening it with one hand as he spoke, whilst with the other he presented his note, "and I have the honour in that paper to have executed your demands."

Euphemia caught it eagerly; and Thaddeus immediately leaping out, wished her a good night, and hurried back into the house. Whilst the carriage drove away he ascended to the drawing room to fetch his hat and take leave of the countess.

Lady Tinemouth had seated herself on the sofa, and was leaning thoughtfully against one of its arms, when he re-entered. He approached her. "I wish you a good night Lady Tinemouth." She turned her head.

"Mr. Constantine, I wish you would stay a little longer with me; my spirits are disturbed, and I am afraid it will be near morning before Maria returns from Richmond. These rural balls are sad dissipated things!"

Thaddeus laid down his hat and took his seat by her side.

"I am happy, dear Lady Tinemouth, at all times to be with you; but I am sorry to hear that you have met with any thing to discompose you. I was afraid, when I came in, that something disagreeable had happened; your eyes—"

"Alas! if my eyes always told when I had been weeping, they might ever be telling tales!" Her ladyship passed her hand across her eyes as she spoke, and added: "We may think on our sorrows with an outward air of tranquillity; but we cannot always speak of them, without showing that the subject gives us agitation."

"Ah, Lady Tinemouth!" exclaimed the count, drawing close to her, "could not even your feeling heart escape calamity?"

"To cherish a feeling heart, my young friend," replied she, "is not a very effectual way to oppose the pressure of affliction. On the reverse, such a temper of mind will extract unhappiness from causes which might escape dispositions of less susceptibility. Ideas of feeling, sensibility, and sympathy, are pretty toys for a novice to play with; but change these wooden swords into weapons of real metal, and you will find the point through your heart before you are aware of the danger. At least I found it so. Mr. Constantine I have frequently promised to explain to you the reason of the sadness which so often tinges my conversation; indeed, I know not when I shall be in a more fit humour to indulge myself at your expense, for I never felt more wretched, never stood more in need of the consolation of a friend."

Her ladyship covered her face with a handkerchief, and remained so some time. Thaddeus pressed her hand several times, and waited in respectful silence till she should recommence. She raised her head.

"Forgive me, my dear sir; I am very low to-night—very nervous. I have encountered two of three distressing circumstances to-day, and these tears relieve me. You have heard me speak of my son and my lord; yet I never had resolution to recount how we were separated. This morning I saw my son pass my window, he looked up, but the moment I appeared, he turned away and hastened down the street. Though I have received many stronger proofs of dislike, both from his father and himself; yet, slight as this offence may seem, it pierced me to the heart. O, Mr. Constantine, to feel that the child to whom I gave life, should regard me with abhorrence, is dreadful—is beyond even the anxious partiality of a mother, either to excuse or palliate!"

"Perhaps, dear Lady Tinemouth, you misjudge lord Harwold; he may be under the commands of his father, and yet inwardly long to show his affection and duty."

"No, Mr. Constantine, your good heart is too young to know what may be the guilt of another. Gracious heaven, am I obliged to speak so of my own son! He who was my darling! He who once loved me dearer than existence! But hear me, my dear sir, you shall judge for yourself; and you will wonder that I am now alive to endure more. I have suffered by him, by his father, and by a dreadful woman, who not only tore my husband and children from me, but stood by till I was beaten to the ground. Yes, Mr. Constantine, any man of feeling would shudder, as you do, at such an assertion; but it is too true. Soon after Lady Sophia Lovel became the mistress of my lord, and persuaded him to take my son from me, I heard that the poor boy had fallen ill through grief, and lay sick at his lordship's house in Hampshire. I heard that he was dying. Imagine my agonies. Wild with distress, I flew to the lodge, and, forgetful of any thing but my child, was hastening across the park, when I saw this woman, this Lady Sophia, approaching me, followed by two female servants. One of them carried my daughter, then an infant, in her arms; and the other, a child of which this unnatural wretch had recently become the mother. I was flying towards my little Albina to clasp her to my heart, when Lady Sophia caught hold of my arm. Her voice now rings in my ears.

"Woman!" cried she, "leave this place, or you shall be compelled to do so."

"Struggling in vain to break from her, I implored only to be permitted to embrace my child; but she held me fast, and regardless of my cries, ordered both the women to return into the house.—Driven to despair, I dropped on my knees, conjuring her, by her feelings as a mother, to allow me, for one moment, to see my dying son; and that I would promise, by my hopes of everlasting happiness, to cherish her child as my own, should it ever stand in need of a friend. The horrid woman only laughed at my prayers, and left me lying in a swoon upon the grass. When I recovered, the first objects beheld were my lord and lady Sophia, standing near me, and myself in the arms of a man servant, whom they had commanded to carry me outside the gate. At the sight of my husband, I sprang to his feet, when, with one dreadful blow of his hand he knocked me to the ground. Merciful Providence! I wonder I retained my senses! I beseeched him to give me a second blow that I might suffer no more."

"Take her out of my sight," cried he, "for she is mad."

"I was taken out of his sight more dead than alive, and led by his pitying servants to an inn, where I was afterwards confined three weeks with a brain fever; from that hour I have never known a day of entire health."

Thaddeus was shocked beyond utterance at this anecdote. The paleness of his countenance being the only reply that he could make to her ladyship, she resumed:

"I have got out of order. I proposed to inform you clearly of my situation, but the principal sorrow of my heart rose immediately to my lips. I will commence regularly, if I can methodize my recollection.

"The earl of Tinemouth married me from passion; I will not sanctify his emotions, by the name of affection; though," added she, forcing a smile, whilst turning her head towards the looking-glass, she put aside the crape veil which shaded her face, "these faded features too painly declare, 'that of all mankind I loved but him alone!' I was just fifteen when he came to visit my father, who lived in Berkshire My father, Mr. Cumnor, and his father, Lord Harwold, had been friends at college. My lord, then Mr. Stanhope, was young, handsome and captivating. He remained all the autumn with us; at the end of that period, declared an affection for me which my heart too readily answered. About this time he received a summons from his father, and we parted. Like most little girls of my age, I felt an unconquerable bashfulness to admit any confidence in my attachment; hence my parents knew nothing of the affair till it burst upon them in its cruelest shape.

"About two months after Mr. Stanhope's departure, a letter arrived from him, urging me to fly with him to Scotland. He alledged as a reason for such a step, that his grandfather, the earl of Tinemonth, insisted on his forming a union with Lady Sophia Lovel, who was young widow, and the favorite niece of the most powerful nobleman in the kingdom. Upon this demand, he told the earl on whom his affections were placed. His lordship, whose passions were those of a madman, broke into such horrible execrations of myself and family, as Mr. Stanhope confessed, made him forget his duty; and he peremtorily swore that no power on earth should compel him either to marry so notorious a woman as Lady Sophia Lovel, or to give up me. He concluded, with repeating his entreaties that I would consent to go with him to Scotland. The subject of this alarmed me, and I showed it to my parents. My father answered it in a manner that befitted his own character, but which irritated the impetuous passion of my lover almost to frenzy. In short, in a paroxysm of rage, he flew to his grandfather; upbraided him with the ruin of his happiness, and so tempted the old man that he drew his sword upon him, and had it not been for the interference of Lord Harwold, a most fatal catastrophe might have ensued. To end the affair at once, Lord Harwold, whose gentle nature had always embraced the mildest measures, obtained the earl's permission to send Mr. Stanhope abroad.

"Meanwhile, I was upheld by my father, who is now no more, in firmly rejecting all my lover's entreaties for a private marriage. As Stanhope's grandfather was equally deaf to all compromise, he at length was persuaded, by his father, to accompany a relation to France.

"At the end of a few weeks, Mr. Stanhope began his cousin as a spy; and after a violent quarrel they p one knowing to what quarter my lover had directed hi believe I was the first who heard any tidings of him. ber well, it was in 1771, about three and twenty years I received a letter from him; (O! how legibly are thes stances yet written on my heart!) It was dated where, he told me, he had resided in complete retireme the period of his banishment, under the assumed Sackville."

At this name Thaddeus uttered a groan of horror; every feature of his face fixed in dismay, fell back on

The countess caught hold of his hand. "What is ter? For heaven's sake! what is the matter?"

The bolt of indelible disgrace had struck to his hear some minutes before he could recover; but when he d he said "Pray go on, Madam; I am subject to thes in my breast. Pray forgive me, and go on; I shal better as you proceed."

"No, my dear friend; I will quit my dismal story a and resume it some other time."

"Pray continue it now," rejoined Thaddeus; "I sh be more fit to listen. Do, I entreat you."

"Are you sincere in your request? I fear that I hav tired you."

"No; I am sincere; let me hear it all. Do not h any thing which relates to that barbarian Englishr married you."

"Alas! he did," resumed her ladyship, "for wh turned, which was in consequence of the Earl of Tin death, my father was also dead, who might have stood me and my inclination, and so preserved me from m ceeding sorrows. I sealed my fate and became his w

"The father of my husband was now Earl of Tin and as he had never been averse to the union, prese with a cottage on the banks of the Wire, where I pas delightful years, the happiest of woman kind. My l my mother, and my infant son formed my felicity; an I prized it; too greatly to be allowed a long continua

"At the end of this period, some gay friends came visit us. When they returned to town they persuade to be one of the party. He went, after much entreaty, he expected that I should be confined in the course weeks. And from that fatal day all my sufferings took

"Lord Harwold, instead of being with me in a fortnight, a he had promised, procrastinated his absence, under variou excuses, from week to week; during which interval my Albin was born. Day after day I anticipated the delight of puttin her in the arms of her father; but she was three months ol defore he appeared; and ah! how changed. He was gloom to me, uncivil to my mother, and hardly looked on the child.

Lady Tinemonth stopped at this part of her narrative, t wipe away her tears. Thaddeus was sitting forward to th table, leaning on his arm, with his hand covering his fac The countess felt grateful for an excess of sympathy whic she did not expect; and taking his other hand, as it lay mo tionless on his knee, "what a consolation would it be to me, exclaimed she, "durst I entertain a hope that I may one da behold but half this pity in the breast of my son."

Thaddeus only pressed her hand, he did not venture to reply He could not tell her that she deceived herself, even here; tha he did not only deplore her misfortunes, but owed the agonie which were shaking him to the injuries of his own mother, whos the villanous conduct of this very earl, under the name o Sackville, had devoted to a life of self-reproach. He had de rived existence from the husband of Lady Tinemouth. Th conviction humbled him, crushed him, and trod him to the earth

The countess resumed:—

"It would be impossible, my dear sir, to describe to yo the gradual changes which assured me I had lost the heart of m husband. Before the end of the winter he left me again; an I saw him no more till that hour in which he struck me to th ground.

"Lord Tinemouth came into Monmouthshire about si weeks after I had taken leave of my lord. I was surpsise and rejoiced to see my good father-in-law; but how soon wer my emotions driven into a different course! He revealed to me in the tenderest manner possible, that during Lord Harwold' first visit to town, he had, unknown to him, been in the habi of spending entire evenings with Lady Sophia Lovel·

"This woman," added he "is the most artful creatur breathing. In spite of her acknowledged dishonour, you wel know that my deceased father would gladly have married he to my son; and now it seems, actuated by revenge, she re sents Lord Harwold's refusal of her hand, by seducing hin from his wife. Alas! I am too well convinced that the erro in my son's temper bear a strict analogy with those of hi grandfather. Impatient of contradiction, flattery can mouk him to what shape it pleases. Lady Sophia has discovered these weak points in his character; and, I am informed by his steward, has persuaded him that you impose upon his affection by detaining him from the world. This argument must have been well seconded by other fascinations, for in regard to beauty she is only moderate; yet she has succeeded, and my deluded son has accompanied her into Spain."

"You may imagine, Mr. Constantine, my distraction at this intelligence. I was like one frantic, and Lord Tinemouth, fearing to trust me in such despair out of his sight, brought us all with him to London. In less than four months afterwards, I was deprived of this inestimable friend by a paralytic stroke. His death summoned the new earl to England. Whilst I lay on a sick-bed, into which I had been thrown by the shock, my lord and his mistress arrived.

"They immediately assumed the command of my lamented protector's house, and ordered my mother to clear it directly of me. My broken-hearted parent obeyed, and I was carried, in a senseless state, to a lodging in the nearest street. But when this dear mother returned for my children, neither of them were permitted to see her. The malignant Lady Sophia, actuated by an insatiable hatred of me, easily wrought on my frantic husband (for I must believe him mad) to detain them entirely. A short time after this that dreadful scene happened which I have before described.

"Year succeeded year, during which time I received many cruel insults from my husband, many horrible ones from my son; for I had been advised to institute a suit against my lord, in which I only pleaded for the return of my children. I lost my cause, owing, I hope, to bad counsel, not to the laws of my country. I was adjudged to be separated from the earl, with the maintainance of six hundred a year, which he hardly pays. I was tied down never to speak to him, or his son, or his daughter. Though this sentence was passed, I never acknowledged its justice, but wrote several times to my children. Lord Harwold, who is too deeply infected with his father's cruelty, has either returned my letters unopened, or with unsulting replies.—For my daughter, she keeps an undeviating silence; and I have not even seen her since that moment when she was hurried from my eyes in Tinemouth Park.

"In vain her mother tries to convince me that she detests me; I will not believe it; and the hope that should I survive her father, I may yet embrace my child, has been, and will be, my source of comfort till it be fulfilled, or I bury my disappointment in the grave."

Tinemouth put her handkerchief to her eyes, which ain flowing with tears. Thaddeus thought he must f he would not betray an interest in her narrative,
e determined no circumstance should ever humble him
; and raising his head from his hand unconsciously ed to the countess his dry and blood-shot eyes, flushed nd convulsed lip.

d, sympathising Constantine! surely such a heart as er would bring sorrow to the breast of a virtuous wife!" were her ladyship's thoughts, though she did not give erance. Thaddeus rose from his seat.

well Lady Tinemouth," said he taking his hat, "may less you, and pardon your husband!"

grasping her hand, with what he intended should be a of friendship, but which his internal tortures rendered ntolerable, he hastened down stairs, opened the out-
r, and got into the street.

nowing, and heedless whither he went, with the steps driven by the furies, he traversed first one street and ther. As he went along, in vain the watchmen him, by their cries, that it was past three o'clock; andered on, forgetting that it was night, that he had e, any destination.

her was discovered! That father, who notwithstand-ilt, he had entertained a latent hope should they ever ht produce some excuse for having been betrayed into sgraceful to a man of honor. But when these filial ere blasted by the conviction that he owed his being sband of Lady Tinemouth; that his mother was the a profligate; that he had sprung from a man who nly a villain, but the most wanton, the most despica-ians; he saw himself bereft of hope, and overwhelm-hame and horror.

reflections, which none other than a son in such cir-es can conceive, he was lost amidst the obscure alleys ham-court-road, when loud and frequent cries recallention. A quantity of smoke, with flashes of light, suppose that they were occasioned by a fire; and a farther, the tremendous spectacle burst upon his sight.
a house, from the windows of which the flames were out with the most alarming rapidity, whilst the peowere either standing in stupified astonishment, or shouting for engines and assistance.

moment the count arrived, two or three naked just escaped from their beds, were flying from side aking the air echo with their shrieks.

"Will nobody save my children?" cried one of them, approaching Thaddeus, and wringing her hands in agony, "will nobody take them from the fire"

"Where shall I seek them?" replied he.

"Oh! in that room," replied she, pointing, "the flames are already there! they will be burnt! they will be burnt!"

The poor woman was hurying franticly foward when the count stopped her, and giving her in charge to a bystander, "take care of this woman," cried he, "I will save her children, if possible."

Darting through the open door in defiance of the smoke and danger, he made his way to the children's room, where, almost suffocated by the sulphurous cloud that surrounded him, he at last found the bed, but it only contained one of the children. This he instantly caught up in his arms and was hastening down the stairs, when the cries of the other, from a distant part of the building, made him hesitate; but thinking it better to secure one than hazard both by lingering, he got into the street just as a post-chaise had stopped to inquire the particulars of the accident. The carriage door being open, and Thaddeus seeing people in it, without saying a word threw the sleeping infant into their laps, and hastened back into the house, where he hoped to rescue the other before the fire could increase.

The flames had now made a dreadful progress, and scorched his face, hands, and clothes, as he flew from room to room, following the shrieks of the child, who seemed to change its situation with every exertion he made to reach it. At length, when every moment he expected the house would sink under his feet, he directed his steps, as a last attempt, along a passage which he had not before observed, and, to his great joy, beheld the object of his search flying down a back stair-case. The boy immediately sprung into his arms, and Thaddeus, turning round, leaped from one landing place to another till he found himself in the street, and surrounded by a concourse of people.

He saw the poor mother clasp the rescued child to her breast, and whilst the spectators were loading her with congratulations, he left the crowd and proceeded homewards with a warmth at his heart which made him forget, in the joy of a benevolent action, that petrifying shock, occasioned by the vices of one too nearly allied to his being to be hated without horror.

END OF VOL. I.

THADDEUS OF WARSAW.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

BY MISS PORTER.

The time of life is short;
To spend that shortness basely, were too long,
If life did ride upon a dial's point,
Still ending at the arrival of an hour.

Shakspeare

VOL. II.

New York:
CHARLES WELLS.
1836.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
ASTOR, LENOX AND
TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
1918 L

THADDEUS OF WARSAW.

CHAPTER XVII.

When Thaddeus awoke next morning, he found himself ore refreshed and freer from the effects of the last night's scovery, than he could have reasonably hoped. The labour id anxiety which the fire had compelled him to exert, hav- g forced his thoughts into a different channel, afforded his rves an opportunity to regain some portion of their usual rength. He could now ponder on what he had heard, with- it suffering the crimes of another to lay him on the rack. he reins were again restored to his hands, and only as much his mind as he pleased, could now show itself either in his ce or manner.

Though the Count's feelings were very sensible, and when ddenly attacked, it was not always that he could hide the in he felt; yet he possessed a power of look that immediate- repressed any curiosity which might have been impertinent. dced, this manner of repulsion was often proved to be his st friend, for never had man more demands on the dignity his soul to shine out about his person.

Not unfrequently, when Miss Dundas has been schooling r sister on the absurd civilities which she paid to her lan- age-master; and half a dozen pretty beaus and belles have ned in the ridicule, the appearance of the Count has at once lled a natural glow through the ladies' rouge and silenced the ntlemen.

The morning after the fire, a little bevy of fashionable but- flies were collected in this way, in one corner of Miss Dun- s's study, when during a moment's pause, "I hope Miss aufort," cried the Honourable Mr. Lascelles, a young man a stamp that generally wears the impression of the last eaker, "I hope, Miss Beaufort, you don't intend to consume e brightness of your eyes over this stupid language?"

"What language, Mr. Lascelles!" inquired she, "I have only this moment entered the room, and I don't know what you are talking about."

"Good Lud, that is very true!" cried he, "I mean a shocking jargon, which a shocking penseroso man teaches these ladies. We want to persuade Miss Euphemia that it spoils her mouth."

"You are always misconceiving me, Mr. Lascelles;" interrupted Miss Dundas impatiently, "I did not advance one word against the language; I merely remonstrated with Phemy against her stupid attentions to the man we hire to teach it."

"That was what I meant, Madam," resumed he with a low bow.

"You meant what, Sir," demanded the little beauty contemptuously, "but I need not ask. You are like a bad mirror that from radical defect always gives false reflections."

"Very good, faith, Miss Euphemia! I declare, sterling wit! It would do honour to Sheridan or your sister."

"Mr. Lascelles," cried Euphemia, more vexed than before, "let me tell you, such impertinence is very disgraceful in a gentleman."

"Upon my soul, Miss Euphemia!"

"Pray allow the petulent young lady to get out of her airs, (as she has, I believe got out of her senses,) without our help;" exclaimed Miss Dundas, "for I declare to heaven, I know not where she picked up these vile democratic ideas."

"I am not a democrat, Diana;" answered Euphemia, rising from her seat, "and I won't stay to be abused, when I know it is all envy, because Mr. Constantine happened to say that I had a quicker memory than you have."

She left the room as she ended. Miss Dundas, ready to storm with passion, but striving to conceal it, burst into a violent laugh, and turning to Miss Beaufort, "You see my dear," said she, "a sad specimen of Euphemia's temper; yet I hope you won't think too severely of her, for, poor thing, she has been spoilt by us all."

"Pray do not apologize to me in particular!" replied Miss Beaufort, rather coldly! "but as you have done so, I am induced to say, that I think it probable she would have shown her temper less, had you given your admonition in private, though I cannot doubt of her having committed something wrong."

"Yes something very wrong;" exclaimed Miss Dundas, reddening at a rebuke from a quarter whence she so little expected one; "both Mr. Lascelles, and Lord Berrington there—"

"Don't bring in my name, I pray Miss Dundas;" cried the Viscount, who had been sitting in a recess looking over an old edition of Messinger's Plays; "you know I hate being squeezed into squabbles."

Miss Dundas dropped the corners of her mouth in contempt and went on.

"Well then Mr. Lascelles and Miss Poyntz here, have both at different times been present when Phemy has conducted herself in a very ridiculous way towards a young man whom Lady Tinemouth made a great fuss about sending to teach us German. Can you believe it possible, that a girl of her fashion could behave in this style without having first imbibed some very dangerous notions? I am sure I am right, for she treats him with three times the politeness she uses to the gentlemen who are now in the room." Miss Dundas, supposing that she had set the business in a light beyond controversy, stopped with an air of triumph, Miss Beaufort perceived that her answer was expected.

"I really cannot discover any thing in the affair so very reprehensible;" said she, "Perhaps this man you speak of may have talents and worth; he may be above his situation."

"Ah! above it sure enough!" cried Lascelles, laughing boisterously at his own folly, "he is tall enough to be above every thing, even good manners, for notwithstanding his plebeian calling, I don't find that he knows how to keep his distance."

"I am sorry for that, Lascelles," cried Berrington measuring the puppy with his good-natured eye, "for these Magog men are terrible objects to us of meaner dimensions! 'A substitute shines brightly as a king, until a king be by.'"

"Why, my lord, you do not mean to compare me with such a low fellow as this? I don't understand Lord Berrington—"

"Bless me, gentlemen!" cried Miss Dundas, frightened at the angry looks of the little honourable, "Why my lord, I thought you hated squabbles?"

"So I do, Miss Dundas;" "replied he, laying down his book and coming forward, "and, upon my honour, Mr. Lascelles," added he, smiling and turning towards the coxcomb, who stood nidging his head with anger, by Miss Beaufort's chair; "upon my honour, Mr. Lascelles, I did not mean to draw any parallel whatever between your person and talents, and those of this Mr. —— I forget his name, for truly I never saw him in my life; but I dare swear, that, that no comparison can exist between you."

Lascelles took the surface of this speech and bowed; whilst his lordship turning to Miss Beaufort, began to compliment himself on possessing so fair an ally in defence of the absent person.

"I have never seen him;" replied she, "and what is more, I never heard of him, till on entering the room, Mr. Lascelles attacked me for my opinion. I only arrived from the country last night, therefore I am quite at a loss to guess the real grounds of this ill-judged bustle of Miss Dundas about a man whom she styles despicable. If he be, why retain him in her service? And what is more absurd, why make a person in that subordinate situation, the subject of debate among her friends?"

"You are right, Miss Beaufort," returned Lord Berrington; "But the eloquent Miss Dundas is so kind to her friends, that she lets no opportunity slip of displaying her power, both over the republic of words and the empire of her mother's family."

"Are you not severe now, Lord Berrington? I thought you merciful to the poor tutor."

"No; I hope I am faithful on both subjects. I know her; and it is true, that I have seen nothing of the tutor, but it is natural to wield the sword in favour of the defenceless, and I always regard the absent in that light."

Whilst these two conversed at one end of the room, the other group were arraigning the presumption of the vulgar, and the folly of those who gave it encouragement.

At a fresh burst of laughter from Miss Dundas, Miss Beaufort turned her head as we mechanically do on hearing an unexpected noise: her eye was arrested by the appearance of a gentleman in black, who was standing a few paces within the door. He was regarding the party before him with that lofty tranquillity which is inseparable from high rank, when accompanied by virtue. His figure, his face and his air, contained that pure simplicity of contour, which at the same time pourtrays all the graces of youth, with the dignity of manhood.

Miss Beaufort in a moment perceived that he was unobserved; and rising from her seat, "Miss Dundas," said she, "here is a gentleman."

"You may sit down Mr. Constantine."

"Gracious Heaven," thought Miss Beaufort, as he approached, and the ingenuous expression of his fine countenance was directed towards her. "Can this noble creature have been the subject of such impertinence?"

"I commend little Phemy's taste;" wispered Lord Berrington, leaving his seat;" "ha! Miss Beaufort, a young Apollo?"

"And not in disguise," replied she in the same manner, just as Thaddeus had bowed to her; and with 'veiled lids' was taking up a book from the table, not to read but literally to have an object to look on that could not insult him.

"What did Miss Dundas say was his name?" whispered the viscount.

"Constantine, I think."

"Mr. Constantine," said the benevolent Berrington, "will you accept of this chair?"

Thaddeus declined it. But the viscount read in the "proud humility" of his brow, that he had not always waited like a dependent on the nods of insolent men and women of fashion; and with a good humoured compulsion, he added, "pray oblige me, for by that means I shall have an excuse to squeeze into the Sultane that is so 'happy as to bear the weight of Beaufort!'"

Though Miss Beaufort had only seen his lordship once before (and that hardly for ten minutes, with her cousin in Leicestershire) she smiled at this unexpected freedom, and in consideration of the motive, made room for him on the sofa.

Insult was not swifter than kindness, in its passage to the heart of Thaddeus; who, whilst he received the viscount's chair, raised his face towards him with a look beaming such graciousness and obligation, that Miss Beaufort turned with renewed contempt on the party which were leaving the study.

The instant Miss Dundas closed the door after her, Lord Berrington exclaimed, "Upon my honour Mr. Constantine, I have a good mind to put that terrible pupil of yours into my next comedy! don't you think she would beat Katharine and Petruchio all to nothing? I declare I will have her."

"In propria persona, I hope," asked Miss Beaufort, with more bitterness than she was accustomed to conceive, much less approve, by giving it expression.

The Count remained silent during these remarks though he fully appreciated the first civil treatment which had greeted him since his admission within the doors of Lady Dundas. Miss Euphemia's attentions had any other source than benevolence.

Miss Beaufort wished to relieve his embarrassment by addressing him: but the more she thought the less she knew what to say; and she had just abandoned it as a vain attempt, when Miss Euphemia entered the room alone, she curtsied to Thaddeus, and took her place at the table. Lord Berrington rose.

"I must say good bye, Miss Euphemia; I will not disturb your studies. Farewell, Miss Beaufort," added he, addressing her, and bending his lips to her hand, "adieu, I shall look in upon you to-morrow. Good morning Mr. Constantine."

Thaddeus bowed to him and the viscount disappeared.

"I am surprised, Miss Beaufort," observed Euphemia pettishly, her temper not having subsided since her sister's lecture, "how can you endure that coxcomb!"

"Pardon me, Euphemia," replied she, "though I did not exactly expect the ceremony his lordship uses in taking leave, yet I think there is a generosity in his sentiments, which deserves a better title."

"I know nothing about his sentiments, for I always run away from his conversation. A better title? I declare you make me laugh. Did you ever see such fantastical dressing? I vow to heaven, I never meet him without thinking of Jemmy Jessamy, and the rest of the gossamer beaux that squired our grandmothers?"

"My acquaintance with Lord Berrington is trifling;" returned Miss Beaufort, withdrawing her eyes from the pensive features of the Count, who was sorting the lessons: "Yet I am so far prepossessed in his favour, that I see little in his appearance to apprehend. However, I will not contest that point, as perhaps the philanthrophy I this morning discovered in his heart, the honest warmth with which he defended a traduced character, after you left the room, might render his person as charming in my eyes, as I certainly found his mind."

Thaddeus had not for a long time heard such sentiments out of lady Tinemouth's circle, and he now looked up to take a distinct view of the speaker.

In consequence of the established mode, that the presiding lady of the house is to give the tone to her guests, many were the lords and ladies who sat with the Count in Miss Dundas's library, whose faces he was as ignorant of when they went out as when they came in. They took little notice of him; and he, regarding them much less, pursued his occupation without evincing a greater consciousness of their presence, than what mere ceremony demanded.

Accordingly, this morning, when in compliance with Lord Berrington's politeness, he received his chair, and saw him remove to a sofa beside a very beautiful woman, he supposed that she resembled the rest of Miss Dundas's friends, and never directed his eyes a second time to her figure. But when he heard her (in a voice that was melody itself) defend his lordship's character, on principles which bore the most honorable testimony to her own, his eyes rivetted themselves on her face.

Though a long muslin wrapper involved her fine person, a modest grace was observable in every limb. Her snowy arm, clasped with a loose pearl bracelet, was extended towards Euphemia, in the energy of her defence: her beautiful eyes shone with benevolence, and her rosy lips seemed to breathe balm whilst she spoke.

Thaddeus did not withdraw his fixed eyes till they encountered those of Miss Beaufort, which immediately retreated with a deep blush covering her face and neck. She had never encountered such a look before, except from the dark and penetrating glances of her cousin, who had long elected himself the guardian of her heart.

Miss Beaufort was the orphan heiress of Admiral Beaufort, an only brother of the late lady Somerset. Her parents dying at an early age, bequeathed her to the care of Lady Somerset, her paternal aunt, and nominated Sir Robert Somerset, her ladyship's husband, to be her sole guardian.—When Lady Somerset died, which happened three days before her son's arrival from the continent, a double portion of Sir Robert's love fell upon this niece. In her society alone he found comfort; and, relinquishing the splendid scenes of London, he retired into the country; living sometimes at one seat and sometimes at another, in hopes by change of place, to dissipate some of the grief that wrankled at his heart.

Sir Robert Somerset from the time that his marriage took place with Miss Beaufort, to the hour in which he followed her to the grave, had attracted esteem and affection from people of every rank. The facination of his manners, united with the inflexible probity of his character, both as a man and as a senator, drew after him the confidence of all men. The good, and even the bad, looked on him as a pillar of strength, whenever reliance was to be allied with virtue. For instance the excellent Lord Arun bequeathed his only child to his protection; and the sordid, and peculant Sir Hector Dundas when he descended to Hades, nominated Sir Robert Somerset principal trustee over the immense fortunes of his wife and daughters.

This latter circumstance explains the intimacy between two families, the female parts of which might otherwise never have met.

On Sir Robert's last visit to London, lady Dundas, became so urgent in requesting Miss Beaufort might spend the ensuing season with her in town, that he could not, without absolute rudeness, refuse. In compliance with this arrangement, Miss Beaufort, accompanied by Mrs. Dorothy Somerset, a maiden sister of the Baronet, quitted Deerhurst, and settled themselves in Harley-street for the remainder of the winter; at least the winter of fashion; which by a strange effect of her magic finger, in defiance of grassy meadows, and leafy trees, and sweet scented flowers, extends its nominal sceptre over the vernal months of April, May, and even the rich treasures of "resplendant June."

The summer part of this winter, Miss Beaufort reluctantly consented should be sacrificed to ceremony, in the dust and heat of a great city; and if the melancholy which increased upon Sir Robert every day since the death of his wife, had not rendered her averse to oppose his wishes, she certainly would have made objections to the visit.

During their journey, she could not refrain from drawing a comparison between the insipid routine of Lady Dundas's way of life, and the rational, as well as splendid arrangement of her late aunt.

Lady Somerset's monthly assemblies were not only the most elegant and brilliant parties about town, but the weekly conversations surpassed every thing of the kind in the kingdom. On these nights, her ladyship's room used to be filled with the most eminent characters which England could afford. There the young Mary Beaufort, whose ardent disposition impelled with a comet's velocity to the feet of genius, listened to pious divines of every Christian persuasion; there, she gathered wisdom from real philosophers; and in the society of our best living poets, cherished an enthusiasm for all that is great and good. Sir Robert Somerset's house on these evenings, reminded the visitor of what he had read or imagined of the school of Athens. He beheld not only sages, soldiers, statesmen, and poets, but intelligent and amiable women, among whom, the beautiful Mary, imbibed that steady reverence of virtue and talent which no intermixture with the common ephemera of the day, could either displace or alloy.

Notwithstanding this freedom from the chains with which her fashionable advisers would have shackled her mind, Miss Beaufort possessed too much judgment and delicacy to flash her liberty in their eyes. Enjoying her independence with ss, she held it more secure. Mary was no declaimer; 1 in defence of oppressed goodness, or injured genius.

:hat direct opposition often incenses malice, she directhaft from its aim, if it were in her power; and when mpt failed, strove, by respect or compassion, to heal
e could not prevent. Thus, whatever she said or did, stamp of her soul, whose leading attribute was mo-
But having learnt much and thought more, she proved,
:onduct, that reflection is the alchemy which turns lge into wisdom.
Beaufort had never found herself incapable of attempt-
:thing towards her benevolent intention, till she wit-
:he Count Sobieski, standing under an overbearing
e, which his dignified composure rebounded upon his
. The situation was new to her; and when she her confused eyes beneath his unexpected gaze, she :d within herself at the ease with which she had ) the cause of Lord Berrington, and the difficulty she mmon one word as a repellant to the unmerited at-
:he man before her.
:mia cared nothing about Sir Harry; to her his faults rtues were alike indifferent; and forgetting that civili-nded some reply to Miss Beaufort's last observation;
:r taking advantage of the tolerated privilege usurped
r high-bred people, that may be ill-bred when and how ase; she turned to Thaddeus and said with a forced Constantine, I don't like your opinion upon the ode I to you; I think it a very absurd opinion; or perhaps not conceive me rightly?"

Beaufort took up a book that her unoccupied attention ot disturb their studies.
:mia resumed, with a more natural dimple, touching
e with the rosy points of her fingers.
1 are stupid at translation."
deus colored and sat uneasily; he knew not how to lis direct, though covered attack.
1 a bad poet, madam. Indeed it would be dangerous od one, to attempt the same path with Sappho and
."
:mia now blushed as deep as the Count, but from anotive; and opening her grammar, whispered, "you :r a very dull or a very modest man!" and sighing beepeat her lesson.

Whilst he bent his head over the sheet that he was correcting, she suddenly exclaimed, "Bless me Mr. Constantine, what have you been doing? I hope you don't read in bed! The top of your hair is burnt to a cinder! Why, you look much more like having been in a fire than Miss Beaufort does."

Thaddeus put his hand up to his head.

"I did not know that I had carried away any more marks of a fire in which I really was last night, than scorched clothes and hands."

"A fire," interupted Miss Beaufort, closing her book, "was it not near Tottenham-court road?"

"It was madam," answered he in a tone almost as surprised as her own.

"Good gracious!" cried Euphemia, exerting her little voice, that she might be heard before Miss Beaufort should have time to reply, "then I vow you are the gentleman that Miss Beaufort said ran into the burning house, and covered with flames saved two children from perishing!"

"Am I so happy as to meet the lady;" replied he, turning with an animated air to Miss Beaufort, "in you Madam who so humanely assisted the poor sufferers, and received the child from my arms?"

"It was indeed, myself, Mr. Constantine," returned she, a tear swimming over her eye, which in a moment gave the cue to the tender Euphemia. She drew out her handkerchief: and whilst her pretty cheeks overflowed, and her sweet voice was rendered sweeter by an emotion raised by ten thousand delightful fancies, she took hold of Miss Beaufort's hand.

"O! my lovely friend, wonder not that I esteem this brave Constantine far beyond his present station!"

Thaddeus drew back. Miss Beaufort looked amazed; but Euphemia had mounted her romantic Pegassus, and the scene was too sentimental to close.

"Come here, Mr. Constantine," said she extending her other hand to him. Wondering where this folly would terminate, he gave it to her; when instantly joining it with that of Miss Beaufort, she pressed them close together, and said, "sweet Mary! heroic Constantine! I thus elect you the two dearest friends of my heart. So charmingly associated in the delightful task of compassion, you shall ever be comingled in my feeling bosom."

Then putting her handkerchief to her eyes she walked out of the room, leaving Miss Beaufort and the Count, confused and confounded by the side of each other. Miss Beaufort

; that some extravagant passion subsisted between i and her young tutor, declined speaking first. Thadig his gaze on her downcast and revolving counterceived nothing like offended pride at his undesigned ion.—He saw that she was only embarrassed; and, nutes hesita on, said—
e that Miss Beaufort is sufficiently acquainted with ice of Miss Euphemia's character, to pardon the actentional on my part, of having touched her hand?
I had no expectation of Miss Euphemia's design."
ot make any apology to me, Mr. Constantine," re-ie resuming her seat, whence she had risen on the :parture of Euphemia; "To be sure I was a little by the strange situation in which the vivid feelings Euphemia have just made us actors. But I shall not r claim on a share of what she promised—your ac-
:e?" sus expressed how highly he felt the honor of her ision.
not fond of fine terms," continued she smiling: "but imo and merit, must purchase esteem. I can engage st, as I am to remain in town at least three months;
e last, I fear I shall never have the opportunity of
:h an earnest of my deserving as you did last night of

:ps sounded on the stairs. Thaddeus took up his owing, replied to her compliment with such modest : grace, that she gazed after him with wonder, and Before he closed the door he again bowed. Pleased transient look of pleasure which at parting beamed eyes, through whose ingenuous mirrors, she believed ught of his soul might be read, she smiled a second nd as he disappeared, left the room by another

CHAPTER XVIII.

the Count appeared the succeeding day in Harley-iss Beaufort introduced him to Mrs. Dorothy Somer e gentleman who had so gallantly preserved the lives ildren at the hazard of his own.

Notwithstanding the lofty tossing of Miss Dund the good old maid paid him several encomiums on s pidity; and telling him that the sufferers were the family of a poor tradesman, who was gone into the she added, "but we saw them comfortably lodged left them; and all the time we staid, I could not he tulating myself on the easy compliance of Mary whims. I hate to sleep at an inn; and to prevent it t prevailed on Miss Beaufort to pursue our road to t through the night. It was lucky it happened so, for tain that Mary will not allow these poor creatures ment over the wreck of their little property."

"How charmingly charitable, my lovely frien Euphemia, "let us make a collection for this u woman and her babes. Pray as a small tribute, take me!" she put five guineas into the hand of the blushi

The ineffable grace with which the confused Mis laid her money on her aunt's knee, did not escape vation of Thaddeus, neither did the words with wh accompanied. "There, my dear madam," said sh only the agent of your wishes; and I beg you charge of Miss Euphemia's gift, until we see woman."

When Lady Tinemouth was informed by Thadd addition to the Harley-street party, her ladyship her pleasure at the news, saying, that she had bee quainted with both Miss Dorothy and her niece, for before Lady Somerset's death.

As the Countess paused, Thaddeus was on the po pressing his concern that Pembroke had lost also prized mother; but recollecting that Lady Tinem ignorant of their knowing each other, he allowed her without a remark.

"I have never been in company with her ladysh continued the Countess; "It was during his abse continent that I was introduced to Lady Somerset. a woman who possessed the rare talent of conformi to all descriptions of people; and whilst the comp her attentions surpassed the most refined flattery manded the highest veneration for herself. Hence credit my satisfaction in this acquaintance, which bable would never have taken place, had I been Countess of Tinemouth, instead of a deserted wife. standing the family of the Somerset's were related t ıg that some extravagant passion subsisted between ia and her young tutor, declined speaking first. Thading his gaze on her downcast and revolving counte-erceived nothing like offended pride at his undesigned tion.—He saw that she was only embarrassed; and,

inutes hesita on, said—
pe that Miss Beaufort is sufficiently acquainted with nce of Miss Euphemia's character, to pardon the ac-ntentional on my part, of having touched her hand?
I had no expectation of Miss Euphemia's design."
ıot make any apology to me, Mr. Constantine," re-he resuming her seat, whence she had risen on the leparture of Euphemia; "To be sure I was a little d by the strange situation in which the vivid feelings Euphemia have just made us actors. But I shall not y claim on a share of what she promised—your ac-ıce?"
leus expressed how highly he felt the honor of her ınsion.
ı not fond of fine terms," continued she smiling: "but time and merit, must purchase esteem. I can engage ırst, as I am to remain in town at least three months;
he last, I fear I shall never have the opportunity of ıch an earnest of my deserving as you did last night of teps sounded on the stairs. Thaddeus took up his bowing, replied to her compliment with such modest le grace, that she gazed after him with wonder, and Before he closed the door he again bowed. Pleased ı transient look of pleasure which at parting beamed ı eyes, through whose ingenuous mirrors, she believed ıought of his soul might be read, she smiled a second and as he disappeared, left the room by another

CHAPTER XVIII.

ıe the Count appeared the succeeding day in Harley-Miss Beaufort introduced him to Mrs. Dorothy Somer he gentleman who had so gallantly preserved the lives hildren at the hazard of his own.

he should hope I would be there! No, says I, I cannot, for I am on a visit with that precise woman the Countess of Tinemouth, who would not, to save you and all your generation, come into such a mob. Her ladyship shall have my box, cried he, for I would not for the world lose the honour of your opinion on the merits of my farce. To be sure not! cries I, so I accepted his box, and drove off, plotting with lady Sara how to get your ladyship as a chaperon, and Mr. Constantine for your beau. He has promised; so, dear lady Tinemouth don't be inflexible?"

Thaddeus was confounded at the dilemma into which his ready acquiescence had involved his prudence. The Countess shook her head.

"Now I declare, Lady Tinemouth," exclaimed Miss Egerton, "This is an absolute stingy fit! You are afraid of your purse! you know this private box precludes all awkward meetings, and you can have no excuse."

"But it cannot preclude all awkward sights;" answered her ladyship. "You know, Maria, I never go into public, for fear I should be shocked by the angry looks of my lord or son."

"Plague them both," cried Miss Egerton pettishly, "I wish the Lord would take your lord and son out of the world altogether!"

"Maria!" retorted her ladyship with a grave air.

"Rebuke me Lady Tinemouth, if you like; I confess I am no Serena, and these trials of temper don't agree with my constitution. There," cried she throwing a silver medal on the table, and laughing in spite of herself, "there is our free entrance; but I will send it back and so break poor Coleman's heart."

"Fie, Maria," answered her ladyship, patting her half angry cheek, "would you owe to your petulence what was denied to your good humour?"

"Then your ladyship will go!" exclaimed she exultingly, "you have yielded to my good humour, these sullens were a part of my stratagem. I won't let you recede."

The idea struck lady Tinemouth, that this would be a proper opportunity to show one of the theatres to her young friend, without involving him in expense or obligation, and accordingly she ratified her consent.

"Do you intend to favour us with your company, Lady Sara?" asked the Countess with a hope that she would refuse.

Lady Sara, who had been standing during the debate, silently at the window, rather proudly answered,

s Madam, if you will honour me with your protection."
' Tinemouth was the only one present who understood nded feeling which these words conveyed; and almost ıg she had insulted her by implying suspicion, she ap-
:d her ladyship with a pleasing countenance; "Then Sara, perhaps you will dine with me?" said she, "I › call on Mrs. Dorothy Somerset, and invite her to be party."
' Sara curtsied her acceptance of the invitation, and appeared to think no more of the matter. But she forgot it, nor found herself able to forgive Lady Tine-for betraying her into a confidence, which her own tur-passions made too easy of access. She had listened ıgly to the reasonable declaration of the Countess, that y way to retreat from an error which threatened crimivas to avoid the object.
ıen a married woman," observed her ladyship, "is so y as to love another man than her husband, her only
'ests in the resolution to quit his society, and to banish ge whenever it obtrudes."
'Sara, believing herself incapable of this exertion, hated ıman who thought it expedient. Lady Tinemouth,
:r and conversation, tried to display in every possible ıe enormity of giving encouragement to such an atıt; and ended with urging the consideration of her heaven.
his argument, Lady Sara knew little. She had never d on the nature of her Creator, though she sometimes › church, repeated the prayers without feeling their spi-
d when the coughing, sneezing, and blowing of noses, commonly accompany the text, had subsided, she genealled up the remembrance of the last ball, or an anticiof the next assembly, to amuse her till the prosing busias over. From church she drove to the park, where g round the ring, or sauntering in the gardens, she soon that there existed in the universe a power of higher con-ce to please than her own vanity, and the admiration of :ctators.
y Sara would have shuddered at hearing any one deimself a deist, much more an atheist; but for any influıat her nominal belief had over her desires, she might have been either. She never committed an action de-
; the name of premeditated injury; nor went far out of y, to do her best friend a service; not because she wanted inclination, but she ceased to remember both the petitioner and his petition before he had been five minutes from her sight. She had read much as most fine ladies have read: she had perused a few histories, a few volumes of essays, a few novels, and now and then a little poetry; these, and morning calls with evening assemblies, filled up the day. This had been the routine of her life, till she met the Count Sobieski at Lady Tinemouth's which event caused a total revolution in her mind and conduct.

The strength of Lady Sara's understanding might have credited a better education; but her passions bearing an equal power with this vigour, and having taken a wrong direction, she neither felt the will nor capability to hold the empire of her reason. When love entered her heart, his first conquest was her vanity; she surrendered all her admirers in the hope of securing the admiration of Thaddeus: his second victory made him master of her discretion; she revealed her unhappy affection to Lady Tinemouth, and more than hinted to himself. What had she else to lose? she believed her honour to be safer than her life. Her honour was the term. She had no conception, or at best a faint one, that a breach of the marriage vow could be an outrage on the laws of heaven. The word Sin, has been gradually banished the oligarchy of fashion, from the hour in which Charles II. and his profligate court trod down piety along with hypocrisy to this day, when a new philosophy has accomplished its total outlawry, and denounced it a rebel to decency, and the freedom of man.

Thus, religion being driven from the haunts of the great, pagan morality is raised from that prostration, where, Dagon-like, it fell at the feet of the Scriptures, and is again erected as the idol of adoration. Guilt against heaven fades before the decrees of man: his law of ethics reprobate crime; but crime is only a temporary transgression in opposition to the general good; it draws no consequent punishment heavier than the anger of the offended parties. Morality neither promises rewards after death, nor chastisement for error. The disciples of this independent doctrine, hold forth instances of the perfectibility of human actions, produced from the unassisted decisions of human intellect on the limits of right and wrong. They admire virtue, because it is beautiful. They practice it because it is heroic. They do not abstain from the gratification of an intemperate wish, under the belief that it is sinful, but in obedience to their reason which rejects the commission of a vicious act, because it is uncomely. In the first case, God is their judge; in the latter themselves. The comparison need only be proposed to humble the pride that made it necessary. How do these systemisers refine and subtilize? How do they dwell on the principle of virtue, and turn it in every metaphysical light, till their philosophy rarifies it to nothing! Thus, some degrade, and others abandon the only basis on which an upright character can stand with firmness. The bulwark which revelation has erected between the passions and the soul is levelled first, and then that instinctive rule of right which the modern casuist denominates the citadel of virtue falls of course.

By such graduations is the progress of depravity accomplished, and on such premises, did lady Sara, (though she might not arrange them so distinctly,) the general leaven having worked on her mind, deduce, that what she called preserving her honour, was a mere establishment of man, and might be extended or limited by him, to any length he liked. For instance, the Turks were not content with one wife, but appropriated hundreds to their possession; and because such an enlargement was permitted by Mohammed, no other nation presumed to call them culpable.

Hence, she thought, if she could once reconcile herself to believe, that her own happiness was dearer to her than the notice of half a thousand people to whom she was indifferent: that only in their opinion and the world's her flying to the protection of Thaddeus would be a crime; could she confidently think this, what should deter her from instantly throwing herself into the arms of the man she loved?

"Aye?" cried she one night as she traversed her chamber in a paroxysm of tears, "what are the vows I have sworn? how can I keep them? I have sworn to love, to honour Captain Roos; but in spite of myself, without any action of my own, I have broken both these oaths. I cannot love him; I hate him, and I cannot honour the man I hate.—What have I else to break? nothing. My nuptial vow is as completely annihilated, as if I had left him never to return. How?" cried she, after a pause of some minutes, "how shall I know what passes in the mind of Constantine? did he love me, would he protect me, I would brave the whole universe; oh, I should be the happiest of the happy."

Fatal conclusion of reflection! It infected her dreaming and her waking fancy. She regarded every thing as an enemy that opposed her passion; and as the first of these enemies she detested lady Tinemouth. The Countess's last admonishing letter had enraged her by its arguments, and throwing it into the fire with execrations and tears, she determined to pursue her own will, but to affect being influenced by her ladyship's counsels.

The Count Sobieski, who had never surmised the hundredth part of the love which Lady Sara bore towards him, began to hope that her ardent manner had misled him; or, that she had seen through the danger of such imprudence.

Under these impressions the party for the theatre was settled: and Thaddeus, after sitting an hour in Grosvenor Place, returned to his humble home, and attendance on his friend.

CHAPTER XIX.

The addition of Mrs. Dorothy Somerset and Miss Beaufort, to the morning group at Lady Dundas's imparted a less reluctant motion to the before tardy feet of the Count, whenever he turned them towards Harley-street.

Mrs. Dorothy readily supposed him to have been better born than he appeared; and displeased with the treatment he received from Miss Dundas and her guests, behaved to him herself with the most gratifying politeness.

Aunt Dorothy (for that was the title by which every branch of the Baronet's family addressed her) was full twenty years the senior of her brother, Sir Robert Somerset. Having in her youth been thought very like the famous and lovely Mrs. Woffington, she was considered the beauty of her time; and, as such, for ten years continued the reigning toast. Nevertheless, she arrived at the age of sixty-five, without having been either the object or subject of a fervent passion.

Possessing a fine understanding, a fine taste, and fine feelings, she had some way escaped love. It cannot be denied, that she was much admired, much respected, and much esteemed; and that she received two or three splendid proposals from men, whom she had animated thus far. Some of these men she admired, some she respected, and some she esteemed, but not one did she love, and she refused them all. Shortly after their discharge they generally consoled themselves by marrying other women, who, perhaps neither possessed the charms nor the sense of Miss Somerset, yet she congratulated them on their choice and frequently became the friend of both wife and husband, ius, year passed over year; Miss Somerset continued to ss the esteem of every worthy heart, though she could ind the embers of a warmer glow in any one of them; at the age of sixty-five, she found herself an old maid; ossessing as much good humour and affection towards oung people about her, as if she had owned half a dozen r own offspring to mingle in the circle.

lis amiable old lady usually took her netting into the y beside the fair students; and, whenever Thaddeus ed the room (so natural is it for generous natures to sym- ze) his eyes first sought her venerable figure, then glanc- ound to catch an assuring beam from the sunny orbs of vely Mary, seated himself with confidence.

ie presence of these ladies operated as a more than suffi- antidote to the disagreeables of his situation. To them rected all the attention that was not required by his ation; he heard only them speak, when a hundred s were talking; he saw only them, when a hundred s were in company.

addition to this pleasant change, Miss Euphemia's pas- assumed a form less capable of tormenting. She had reading Madam d'Arblay's Camilla, and becoming so oured of the delicacy and pensive silence of the interest- ieroine, she immediately determined on adopting the cters; and at the same time, taking it into her ever ve brain, that Constantine's coldness bore a strict affinity e cautious Edgar Thaddlebert; without further debate iped the rouge off her face, and prepared to "let con- nt, like a worm in the bud, feed on her damask cheek." afford decorous support to this fancy, her gayest clothes thrown aside, to make way for a negligence of apparel, ost her two or three hours each morning to compose. dimpling smiles were now quite vanquished. She was sighing, and, ever silent, and ever lolling and leaning , or reclining along the sofa in some pretty disconsolate de, just selected from a folio of prints, in which she daily d her dress and movements.

addeus preferred this pathetic whim to her former love- dvances; it afforded him quiet and relieved him from embarrassment.

ry succeeding visit induced Miss Beaufort to observe vith nicer accuracy and more lively interest. The no- s, yet humility, with which he behaved towards herself er aunt; and the manly serenity with which he suffered the insulting sarcasms of Miss Dundas, led her not merely to conceive, but to entertain many doubts that his present situation was far below his birth.

The ladies who dropped in now and then on the sisters, were not backward in espousing this game! as it played away a few minutes to join in a laugh with the witty Diana. These gracious beings, from their sex, knew they were privileged to offend; but it was not always that the gentlemen durst venture, beyond a shrug of the shoulder, a drop of the lip, a wink of the eye, or a raising of the brows. However, Mary observed with contempt, that they were wise enough to exercise these specimens of hostility only when the Count had turned his back; and regarding him with increased admiration, she first felt indignation, and then perfect disdain, at the motives of envy which actuated these men to insult him under the mask of indifference.

The occasional calls of lady Tinemouth and Miss Egerton, stimulated the cabal against poor Thaddeus. The sincere sentiment of equality with themselves, which these two ladies evinced by their behaviour to him; and the same conduct being adopted by Mrs. Dorothy and her beautiful niece; besides the evident partiality of Euphemia; altogether inflamed the spleen of Miss Dundas's coterie to absolute rudeness.

The little phalanx, at the head of which was the superb Diana, could offer no real reason for disliking a man, not only beneath them, but who had never offended them even by implication. It was a sufficient apology to their easy consciences, that he gave himself such courtly airs as were quite ridiculous; that his presumption was astonishing. In short, they were all idle, and it was monstrous amusing to lounge a morning with the rich Dundas's, and hoax monsieur.

Had Thaddeus known one fourth of the insolent derision with which his misfortunes were treated behind his back; though he considered the very breath he breathed, ought to be sacrificed if conducive to the life of his friend, perhaps even his necessity could not in this case have detained him in his employment. The brightness of a brave man's name, makes shadows perceptible, which might pass unmarked over a duller surface. Sobieski's nice honor would have supposed itself sullied by enduring such contumely with toleration. But, as was said before, the male adjuncts of Miss Dundas, had received such a prompt warning from an accidental knitting

Count's brow, that they never after could muster temeo sport their wit to his face.
ese circumstances were not lost upon Mary; she coll them as part of a treasure, and turned them over on illow with the jealous examination of a miser. Like emia, she supposed Thaddeus to be other than he d, yet her fancy did not gift him with the blood of ourbons; she merely believed him to be a gentleman;
rom the maternal manner of Lady Tinemouth towards suspected that her ladyship knew more of his history
she choose to reveal.
ings were in this state, when the Countess requested that Dorothy would trust her niece the ensuing evening, with f and a little party to the Hay-market Theatre. The ady having consented, Miss Beaufort received the per-n with pleasure; and as she was invited to sup with dyship, she formed the hope that something might fall he Countess or Miss Egerton, which would throw light true situation of Mr. Constantine.
m infancy, Miss Beaufort had loved with enthusiasm all of excellence. Indeed she esteemed no person warmly, she did not think eminent in the liberal qualities over st of mankind. She sought for something to respect in character; and when by chance she found any thing nire, her susceptible soul blazed, and by its own pure lit her to a clearer examination of the object for whom it interested.
en Lady Somerset collected all the virtue and talent in untry around her table, they were not brought there on errand. From them Miss Beaufort gathered her ssons, in morality and taste; and from them, her ear-erceptions of friendship. Mary, was the beloved pupil, spected friend, of the brightest characters in England;
ough they were men, some of whom had not passed the forty, she had never been in love, nor had mistaken the of her feelings so far, as to call them by that name.
, she neither felt afraid nor ashamed to acknowledge a ondence which she knew to be her best distinction.
d the frank and innocent Mary exhibited half the like ons which she paid to these men in one hour when were present, to the common class of young men
h the course of a month, they would have declared, the poor girl was over head in love with them, and have (what they justly denominate) her folly." Foolish must that woman be, who will sacrifice the most precious gift in her possession, to the superficial graces or empty blandishments of a self idolized coxcomb.

Such a being was not Miss Beaufort; and, on these principles, she contemplated the extraordinary merits of the excellent Thaddeus, with an interest honourable to her penetration and heart.

When Miss Egerton called in Lady Sara Roos's carriage to take her to the Hay-market, Mary was not displeased at seeing Mr. Constantine step out of the coach to hand her in. During their drive, Miss Egerton informed her that from Lady Tinemouth's sudden indisposition, Lady Sara had kindly undertaken to be their chaperon; and promised to bring them all back to sup in Grosvenor-place.

Lady Sara had never seen Mary, though she had frequently heard of her beauty and vast fortune; this last qualification, her Ladyship hoped, might have given an unmerited eclat to the first; therefore when she saw in the person of Miss Beaufort, the most beautiful creature she had ever beheld, nothing could equal her surprise and vexation.

The happy lustre that beamed in the fine eyes of Mary, shone like a vivifying influence around her: a bright glow animated her cheek, whilst a pleasure for which she did not seek to account, bounded at her heart and modulated every tone of her voice to sweetness and enchantment.

"Syren!" thought Lady Sara, withdrawing her large dark eyes from her face, and turning them full of dissolving langour on Thaddeus, "here are all thy charms directed?" then drawing a sigh so deep that it made her neighbour start, she fixed her eyes on her fan, and never looked up till they reached the play-house.

The curtain was raised as the little party seated themselves in the box.

"Can any body tell me what the play is?" asked Lady Sara.

"I never thought of inquiring," replied Maria.

"I looked in the paper this morning," said Miss Beaufort, "and I think it is called Sighs, a translation from a Drama of Kotzebue."

"A strange title was the general observation, when Mr. Suett, who personated one of the characters, beginning to speak, their attention was summoned to the stage.

On the entrance of Mr. Charles Kemble in the character of Adelbert; the Count unconsciously turned pale. He perceived by the dress of the actor, that he intended to personate a Pole; and, alarmed at the probability of seeing something to recall recollections which he strove to banish; his agitation did not allow him to hear any thing that passed.

Miss Egerton was not so tardy in the use of her eyes and ears, but stretching out her hand to the back of the box, where Thaddeus was standing by Lady Sara's chair, she caught hold of his sleeve.

"There, Constantine;" cried she, "look at Adelbert! Now, that is exactly the figure you cut in your Polish trumpery two months ago."

The Count bowed with a forced smile, and glancing at the stage replied:

"Then, for the first time in my life, I regret having followed a lady's advice: I think I must have lost by the change."

"Yes," rejoined she, "you have lost much fur, and much embroidery; but you look much more like a Christian."

The substance of these speeches was not lost on Mary, who continued to mark with redoubling interest the changes which his countenance underwent along with the scene. As she sat forward by a slight turn of her head, she could discern the smallest fluctuation of his features; and they were not a few; for placing himself at the back of Lady Sara's chair, he now leaned over with his soul set in his eye, watching every motion of Mr. Charles Kemble.

Mary knew that Constantine was a Polander; and the surmise which she had entertained of his being unfortunate, received full corroboration at the scene wherein Adelbert is grossly insulted by the rich merchant; during the whole of which, she scarcely dared trust her eyes towards his flushed and agitated face.

The interview between Adelbert and Leopold commenced; when the former was describing his country's miseries with his own, Thaddeus, unable to bear it longer, unobserved by any but Mary, drew back into the box. In a moment or two, Mr. Charles Kemble made the following reply to an observation of Leopold's that poverty is no dishonour.

"Certainly none to me! To Poland, to my struggling country, I sacrificed my wealth as I would have sacrificed my life, if she had required it. My country is no more; and we are wanderers on a burthened earth, finding no refuge but in the hearts of the humane and virtuous."

The passion and force of these words could not fail of reaching the ears of Thaddeus. Mary's attentions followed them to their object, by the heaving of whose breast, she plainly discovered the anguish of their effect. Her pitying heart fluttered. How willingly would she have approached him and said something of sympathy, or consolation! but she might not; and she turned away her tearful eye, and looked again on the stage.

Lady Sara now stood up; hanging over Mary's chair, she listened with congenial emotions to the scene between Adelbert and the innocent Rose. Lady Sara felt it all in her own bosom; and looking round to catch what was passing in the Count's mind, she beheld him leaning against a corner of the box with his head inclined to the curtain of the door.

"Mr. Constantine!" almost unconsciously escaped her lips. He started up immediately, and discovered, by the humidity of his eyes, why he had withdrawn. Her Ladyship's tears were gliding down her cheeks. Miss Egerton, greatly amazed at the oddness of the scene, turned to Miss Beaufort, who a moment before having caught a glispse of the Count, could only smile, and bow her head to Maria's observation.

Who is there that can enter into the bitterness of the heart! Who participate in that joy, which dissolves and rarifies man to the essence of heaven? Soul must mingle with soul, and the invisible language of the spirit must speak, before this can be comprehended.

Mary, who felt ready to suffocate with emotion which she replied from her eyes, gladly affected to be absorbed in the business of the stage, (not one object of which she now saw,) and with breathless attention, lost not one soft whisper, which Lady Sara poured into the ear of Thaddeus.

"Why?" asked her Ladyship, in a tremulous and low voice, "why should we seek ideal miseries, when those of our own hearts are beyond alleviation. Happy Rose?" sighed her Ladyship. "Constantine," continued she, "do not you think Adelbert consoled at least by the affections of that lovely woman?"

Like Miss Beaufort, Constantine had hitherto replied only with bows.

"Come," added Lady Sara, laying her soft hand on his arm, and regarding him with a tenderness so unequivocal that he cast his eyes on the ground though he felt their compassion and sympathy touch his heart; "Come," repeated she, animated by the faint colour which tinged his cheeks, "you know I have the care of this party; and I must not allow our only beau to be so melancholy."

"I beg your pardon, Lady Sara," returned he, in gratitude to her kind commisseration, pressing the hand that yet rested on his arm, "I am not very well. I wish I had not seen this play!"

Lady Sara sunk into the seat from whence she had arisen. He had never before taken her hand, except when assisting her to her carriage: this pressure shook her very soul, and awakened hopes which rendered her for a moment incapable of sustaining herself, or of venturing a reply.

There was something in the tones of Lady Sara's voice and in her manner far more expressive than her words; a mutual sigh which breathed from her Ladyship's bosom, and that of Thaddeus, as they sat down, made a cold shiver run from the head to the foot of Miss Beaufort. The surprise that Mary felt at the meaning of this emotion caused a second tremor, and with a palpitating heart, she asked herself a few questions.

Could this interesting young man, whom every person of sense appeared to esteem and respect, could he sully his virtues by participating in a passion with a married woman? No: it was impossible.

Notwithstanding this decision, she determined to observe him narrowly; and be well convinced of his worth before she permitted him to augment the share of regard which he already possessed in her bosom.

With her head full of these reflections, she awaited the farce, without observing when it appeared. Indeed none present knew any thing about this piece (to see which they had professedly come to the theatre) excepting Miss Egerton, whose ever merry spirits had enjoyed the humour of Totum in the play, and now laughed heartily, though unaccompanied, through the ridiculous whims of the farce.

Nothing that passed could totally disengage the mind of the Count from those remembrances which the recent drama had awakened. When the melting voice of Lady Sara, in whispers tried to recall his attention, by a start only he evinced his recollection of not being alone. However he felt the kindness of her motive; and exerted himself: by the time that the curtain dropt, he had so far rallied his spirits as to attend to the civility of seeing the ladies safe out of the theatre.

Miss Egerton laughing, as he assisted her into the carriage, said, "I verily believe, Mr. Constantine, had I glanced round during the play, I should have seen as pretty a lachrymal scene between you and Lady Sara, as any on the stage. I won't have this flirting? I declare I will tell Captain Roos."

She continued talking! but he, turning about to offer his services to Miss Beaufort, heard no more.

Miss Beaufort felt strangely; she felt cold and reserved; and undesignedly, she appeared what she felt. There was a grave dignity in her air, accompanied with a collectedness and stillness in her before animated countenance, which astonished and chilled Thaddeus, though she bowed her head, and gave him her hand to put her into the coach.

In their way home, Miss Egerton ran over the merits of the play and farce; rallied Thaddeus on the "tall Pole," which she threatened should be his epithet whenever he offended her; and then flying from subject to subject, talked herself and her hearers so weary, that they mutually rejoiced when the carriage stopped in Grosvenor-place.

After they had severally paid their respects to Lady Tinemouth, who, being indisposed, was lying along the sofa, she desired Thaddeus to draw a chair near to her.

"I want to learn said she, what you think of our English theatre?

"Prythee, don't ask him!" cried Miss Egerton, pouring out a glass of wine, "we have seen a tremendous brother Pole of his, who I believe has 'hopped off,' with all his spirits! why he has been looking as rueful as a half drowned man all the night; and for Lady Sara, and I could swear Miss Beaufort too, they have been two Niobes, 'all tears.' So good folks, I must drink better health to you to save myself from the va pours."

"What is all this Mr. Constantine?" asked the Countess, addressing Thaddeus, whose eyes were now fixed with grateful surprise on the blushing though displeased face of Miss Beaufort,

"My weakness," replied he, sighing, and turning to her ladyship: "The play relates to a native of Poland; one, who like myself, an exile in a strange land, is subjected to sufferings and contumelies, which the bravest spirits may find hard to bear. Any man may combat misery; but even the most intrepid will shrink from insult. This I believe is the sum of the story. Its resemblance, in some points to my own, affected me; and" added he, looking gratefully at Lady Sara, and timidly towards Miss Beaufort; "if these ladies have sympathised with feelings, which I strove, but could not entirely conceal, I owe to it, the sweetest consolation that is now in the power of fate to bestow!"

"Poor Constantine!" cried Maria Egerton, patting his head ne hand, whilst with the other she wiped a tear from vays smiling eye, "forgive me if I have hurt you. I ıu vastly, though I must now and then laugh at you, ow hate dismals; so let this tune enliven us all;" and o her piano, she played and sung two or three merry

l the Countess commanded her back to supper.
iis most sociable repast of the whole day, cheerfulness
again to disperse the gloom that threatened the circle.
ius set the example. His unrestrained and elegant ation acquired renewed interest from the anguish he ven back to his heart; like other beds through which n flows, it imparted an undescribable touchingness and ıcy to his sentiments and manner.
r now beheld him in his real character. Unmolested ıaughty presence of Miss Dundas, he became unreservlligent, and enchanting. He was master of every sub-ıd discoursed on all with a grace which corroborated
ing visions, that he was some arch angel ruined.
the increase of Miss Beaufort's admiration of the fine talents, she gradually lost the recollection of what upied her mind relative to Lady Sara; and her own l countenance dilating into confidence and delight, the passed away with pleasure, till the little party separ their several homes.
Tinemouth and Maria were fascinated by the lovely aufort. Miss Beaufort was equally pleased with the s and her friend; but when she thought on Thaddeus, surprised, interested, charmed.
Sara Roos's reflections, were not less flattering; she ith redoubled passion on that look from the Count's at touch of his hand which she thought were signs of ɔcal flame. Both actions were forgotten by him the they were committed; yet he was not ungrateful;
st he acknowledged her attentions, and assented to the ıs of her form, he felt that she would lead him to the a precipice, where, if he fell, he must sink to a depth, rise again.
ught a refuge from such dangerous meditations, in the he ingenuous Mary, on whose modest countenance, ɛemed to have set her seal. Whilst thus recollecting ng kindness of her voice and looks, his heart owned re of purity and in the contemplation of her unaffect-ence, he soon forgot the witcheries of Lady Sara and

CHAPTER XX.

NEXT morning when Thaddeus, according to custom, approached the general's bed to give him his coffee, he found him feverish, and his intellects more than usually unsettled.

The Count awaited with anxiety the arrival of the benevolent Cavendish, whom he expected; and when he appeared, he expressed his increased alarm. Dr. Cavendish having felt the patient's pulse, expressed a wish that he could be induced to take a little exercise. Thaddeus had often urged this necessity to his friend; and having met with constant refusals, he hopelessly repeated the entreaty now, when to his surprise and satisfaction, the old man instantly consented.

Having seen him comfortably dressed (for the Count attended to these minutia with the care of a son) the doctor said they must ride with him to Hyde Park, where he would put them out to walk till he had performed a visit to a sick person in Piccadilly, after which he would return and take them home.

The general not only expressed pleasure at the drive; but as the air felt warm and balmy (it being about the beginning of June,) made no objection to the proposed walk.

He admired the Park, the Serpentine river, the cottage on its bank, and seemed highly diverted by the horsemen and carriages in the ring. The pertinency of his remarks, affording Thaddeus a ray of hope that his senses had not entirely lost their union with reason, he was contemplating with awakened confidence what might be the happy effects of constant exercise, when the general's complaints of weariness obliged him to stop near Piccadilly gate, and await the arrival of the doctor's coach.

He was standing against the railing, supporting Butzou! and, with his hat in his hand, shading his friend's face from the sun; when two or three carriages driving in he met the eyes of Miss Euphemia Dundas! who, pulling the check string, cried out, "Bless me Mr. Constantine! who expected to see you here? Why your note told us that you were confined with a sick friend,"

Thaddeus bowed to her, and still sustaining the debilitated frame of the general on his arm, advanced to the side of the coach. Miss Beaufort now looked out, and expressed a hope that his invalid was better.

"This is the friend I mentioned," said the Count turning his eyes on the mild features of Butzou; "his physician having ordered him to walk, I accompanied him here."

"Dear me! how ill you look sir," cried Euphemia, addressing the poor invalid; "but you are attended by a kind friend."

"My dear lord!" exclaimed the old man, not regarding what she said, "I must go home; call the carriage, you know I am wanted."

Euphemia was again opening her mouth to speak but Miss Beaufort perceiving a look of distress in the expressive features of Mr. Constantine, interrupted her by saying, "Good morning Mr. Constantine; I know we detain you and oppress that gentleman, whose pardon we ought to beg." She bowed her head, with an expression of repectful commisseration beaming from here yes upon the general, whose white hairs were blowing about his face as he attempted to pull the Count back to the pathway.

"My friend cannot thank you, kind Miss Beaufort," cried Thaddeus, with a look of gratitude, that made her blush, "but I do from my heart."

"Here it is! pray my lord come along?" cried Butzou: Thaddeus seeing that this information was right, bowed to the ladies; and their carriage drove off.

Though the wheels of Lady Dundas's coach rolled away from the retreating figures of Thaddeus and his friend, the images of both occupied the meditations of Euphemia and Miss Beaufort, whilst tete-a-tete, and in silence, they made the circuit of the park.

When the carriage again passed the spot on which the subject of their thoughts had stood. Mary almost mechanically, looked out of the window towards the gate.

"Is he gone yet?" asked Euphemia, sighing deeply.

Mary drew in her head with the quickness of conscious guilt; and whilst a color stained her face, that, of itself might have betrayed her prevarication, she asked, "who?"

"Mr. Constantine," replied Euphemia, with a second sigh. "Did you remark, Mary, how gracefully he supported that sick old gentleman! Was it not the personification of youth upholding the fainting steps of age! He put me in mind of the charming young prince, whose name I forget, leading the old Belisarius."

"You are an enthusiast, Euphemia!" returned Mary striving to smile, and wondering within herself, what could be the meaning of those appellations with which the old man had addressed Thaddeus.

"So all tell me," replied Euphemia; "So all say who neither possess the sensibility nor the candor to allow, that great merit may exist without being associated with great rank. "Yet," cried the little beauty in a more animated tone, "I have my doubts, Mary, of his being what he seems. Did you observe the sick gentleman call him my lord?"

"I did," returned Mary, "and I was not surprised. Such manners as Mr. Constantine's are not to be acquired in a cottage."

"Dear, dear Mary;" cried Euphemia, flinging her ivory arms round her neck; how I love you for these words; you are generous, you think nobly, and I no longer hesitate to—to" and, breaking off, she hid herself in Miss Beaufort's bosom.

Mary's heart throbbed, her cheeks grew pale, and she felt a secret wish to stop the tide of Miss Dundas's confidence.

"Dear Euphemia," answered she, your regard for this interesting exile is very praiseworthy.—But beware of——" she hesitated: a conscious twitch in her own breast, stayed the warning that was rising to her tongue; and blushing at a motive which she could not at the instant assign to friendship, selfishness, or envy, she touched the cheek of Euphemia with her quivering lips.

Euphemia had finished the sentence for her, and raising her head, exclaimed: "What should I fear in esteeming Mr Constantine? Is he not the most captivating creature in the world? And for his beauty! Oh, Mary, he is so beautiful that when the library is filled with the handsomest men about town, the moment Constantine enters, their reign is over. I compare them with his godlike figure, and I feel as one looking at the sun; all other objects appear dim and shapeless."

"I hope," returned Mary, rubbing her forehead with her hand, her head beginning to ache strangely, "that Mr. Constantine does not owe your friendship to his fine person? I think his mental qualities are more deserving such a gift."

"Don't look so severe, dear Mary!" cried Miss Dundas, observing that she cast down her eyes, with a contracting brow; "are you displeased with me?"

Mary's displeasure was at the austerity of her own words, and not at her auditor. Raising her eyes with a smile both in them and on her lips, she said, "I do not mean my dear girl, to be severe; but I would wish, for the honour of my sex, that the object which attract either our love or our compassion, should have something more precious than mere personal beauty, to engage our interest."

"Well, I shall soon be satisfied!" cried Euphemia in a tone, as they drove through Grosvenor gate; "We all that Constantine is sensible and accomplished: He s poetry like an angel, both in French and Italian: I hundreds of mottos composed by him; one of them, , is on that work box I gave you yesterday; and what is I will ask him to-morrow, why that old gentleman alled him my lord? If he be a lord!" exclaimed she.

'hat then, inquired the eloquent eyes of Mary.

on't look so impertinent my dear," cried the now ani- l beauty, "I positively won't say another word to you ."

is Beaufort's head-ache had become so painful, that she lieved when Euphemia ceased, and the carriage drew up y Dundas's door.

night of almost unremitted sleep, performed such good on the frame and intellects of General Butzou, that the nxious Thaddeus received with pleasure the opinion of avendish, that he was so much better, as to allow them to hope the best consequences from a constant repetition same air and exercise.—Accordingly, after the ride alk had been repeated the following day, the Count left end to his maps and his little Nanny, and once more took ay to Harley-street. He found only Miss Dundas and ster in the study. Mary (against her will, which she ed because it was her will) had gone out a shopping Miss Dorothy Somerset and lady Dundas.

is Dundas left the room the moment she had finished her s.

hemia, delighted at being tete-a-tete with Thaddeus, for- at she was to act the facinating character of Madam lay's heroine; and shutting her book the instant Diana eared, all at once opened her attack on his confidence.

the eager questions, which the few words of the General cited, the Count afforded no other reply, than the infor- n, that this poor friend knew not what he said, having long time in a state of mental derangement.

is explanation caused a momentary mortification in the ul Euphemia, but, as it was a property of her mind, to a new airy castle immediately on the sinking of the old, on rallied and embraced the supposition "that he might be e, which is more than a lord!" at any rate, let him be he would he charmed her, and he had much ado to parry creasing boldness of her speeches, without letting her at they were understood.

"You are very diffident, Constantine;" cried she, looking down, "if I consider you worthy of my friendship why should you make disqualifying assertions?"

"Every man, madam," returned Thaddeus, bowing as he rose from his chair, "must feel himself diffident of deserving the honour of your notice."

"There is no man living," replied she, blushing "to whom I would offer my friendship but yourself."

Thaddeus bit his lip; he knew not what to answer; bowing a second time he stretched out his hand, and drew his hat towards him. Euphemia's eyes followed the movement.

"You are in a prodigious haste Mr. Constantine!"

"I feel that I intrude madam: and I have promised to be with my sick friend at an early hour."

"Well you may go, since you are obliged;" returned the pretty Euphemia, raising up and smiling sweetly as she laid one hand on his arm, and put the other into her tucker; she drew out a little white leather souvenir, maked with words, 'Toujour cher,' and slipping it into his hand, "there, receive that, Constantine; and retain it as the first pledge of Euphemia Dundas's friendship."

Thaddeus coloured as he took it; and again having recourse to the convenient reply of a bow, left the room overcome with vexation.

There was an indelicacy in this absolutely wooing conduct of Miss Euphemia that notwithstanding her beauty, and the softness which was its vehicle, struck him with the deepest disgust. He could not trace real affection, either in her words or manner; and, that any woman, instigated by a mere whim, should lay aside the decent reserves of her sex, and actually court his regard, surprised, whilst it impelled him to loathe her.

They who adopt Euphemia's sentiments, are little aware of the conclusion which society deduce from such intemperate behaviour. That mistaken creature, who, either at the impulse of her own disposition, or the mandates of example, is led to throw the veil of modesty, literally 'forsakes the guide of her youth' and leaves herself open to every attack which man can devise against virtue.—By levelling the barrier raised by nature she herself exposes the hold of her peace; and may find, too late for recovery, that what modesty has abandoned, is not long held by honour.

Euphemia's affected attachment, suggested to the Count a few unpleasant recollections respecting the fervent and unequivocal passion of lady Sara. Though guilty, it sprung from a head-long ardour of disposition, which formed at once the error and its palliation. He saw that love was not welcomed by her, (at least he thought so,) as a plaything, but struggled with as a foe; he had witnessed her tortures, he pitied them! and to render her happy, would gladly have made any sacrifice short of his future tranquillity. Too well assured of being all the world to lady Sara; the belief that Miss Euphemia liked him only from idleness, caprice and contradiction, caused him to repay her overtures with decided contempt.

When he arrived at home, he threw the pocket-book whose unambigious motto made him laugh at her and himself, into a drawer, and looking round his humble room, whose wicker chairs, oilclothed floor, and uncurtained windows, announced any thing but splendour; "Poor Euphemia!" thought he, "how would you be dismayed, were the indigent Constantine really to take you at your word, and bring you home to such a cheerless habitation!"

The repetition of the late scene, which was communicated to Miss Beaufort from Euphemia, failed in producing a similar effect on her.

Mary could discover no reason why the old gentleman's mental derangement should dignify his friend with titles that he had never borne. She remarked, that his answer to Euphemia appeared evasive; she remembered his emotion and apology on seeing Mr. C. Kemble in Adelbert; and uniting with these facts, his manners, and acquirements, so far beyond the charges of vulgar education, that she could retain no doubt of his being at least well born.

This mysterious Constantine, occupied her hourly thoughts during the space of two months; in which time, she had full opportunity to learn much of a character with whom she had associated almost every day. At lady Tinemouth's (one of whose evening guests she frequently became) she beheld him disrobed of that armour of reserve which was his best repellant against the rude attacks in Harley-street.

In the house of the Countess, Mary saw him welcomed like a certain idolized being, before whose cheering influence, all frowns and clouds must disappear. When he entered, the smile resumed its seat on the languid features of lady Tinemouth! Miss Egertons's eye, lighted up to keener archness; lady Sara's voluptuous orbs floated in pleasure; and for Mary herself, her breast heaved, her cheeks glowed, her hand trembled, a quick sigh escaped her bosom; and whilst she remained in his presence, she believed that happiness had lost its usual evanescent property and had become tangible to hold and press upon the heart.

Mary, who questioned the cause of these tremors on her pillow, bedewed it with delicious though bitter tears, when her alarmed soul whispered that she felt for this amiable foreigner, "a something than friendship dearer."

"Ah! is it come to this?" cried she, pressing down her saturated eyelids with her hand, "am I at last to love a man, who, perhaps never casts a thought on me! How despicable shall I become in my own eyes!"

The pride of woman, puts this charge to her taken heart; that heart that seems tempered of the purest clay, and warmed with the fire of heaven; that tender and disinterested heart, makes as its appeal—What is love? is it not an admiration of all that is beautiful in nature and morality? Is it not a union of loveliness with truth? Is it not a passion whose sole object is the rapture of contemplating the supreme beauty of this combined character?

"Where then," cried the enthusiastic Mary, wiping the tears from her cheek, "where is the shame that can be annexed to my loving Constantine? If it be honourable to love delineated excellence; it must be equally so, to love it when embodied in a human shape. Such it is in Constantine: and if love be the reflected light of virtue, I may cease to arraign myself, of what I otherwise would have scorned. Therefore, Constantine," cried she, raising her clasped hands, whilst renewed tears streamed over her face, "I will love thee: I will pray for thy happiness, though its partner should be Euphemia Dundas!"

Mary's eager imagination would not allow her to perceive those obstacles, in the shape of pride and prudence, which would stand in the way of his obtaining Euphemia's hand; its light, showed to her only a rival, in the person of the little beauty; from whose direct confidence she afterwards retreated with abhorrence.

Had Euphemia been more deserving of Constantine, Miss Beaufort believed she would have felt less reluctant to hear that she also loved him. But Mary could not avoid seeing, that Miss Euphemia Dundas possessed little to ensure comfort, if mere beauty and accidental flight of good humour, were not admitted into the scale. She was weak in understanding, timid of principle, absurd in almost every sentiment she adopted; and as for love, true, dignified, respectable love, she knew nothing of the feeling.

ıilst Miss Beaufort meditated on this meagre schedule of ral's merits, the probability that even such a man as Conne, might sacrifice himself to flattery and splendour, her to the soul.
e more she reflected on it, the more she conceived it likely.
emia was considered a beauty of the day; her affectation ined prettinesses pleased many, and might charm Conne: she was mistress of fifty thousand pounds; and did teem it necessary to conceal from her favorite, the empire
d acquired. Perhaps there was generosity in this open-if so, what might it not effect on a grateful disposition?
:her, (her mortified heart murmured in the words of her Dorothy;) How might it not operate on the mind of one t sex, which at best, is equally moved by caprice, as ıent?
ry blushed at the appropriation of this opinion; and with herself for the injustice which a lurking jealousy ıduced her to throw on Constantine's noble nature, she ed, whatever were her struggles, to promote his happi-
o the utmost of her power.
e next morning, when Miss Beaufort opened the study
she found Mr. Constantine at his station, literally baited en Miss Dundas and her honourable lover. At such nts, Mary always appeared the kindest of the kind.
ved to see Constantine smile; and, whenever she could e that effect by turning the spleen of these polite sneerers it themselves, the smiles which entered her heart afforded quet for hours after his departure.
ry drew out her work (which was a purse that she was for lady Tinemouth) and taking a seat beside Thad-strove, along with Euphemia, to occupy his attention
y, that he might not catch even one of those insolent
s, which were passing from Lascelles, and a new ally, he had obtained in the pretty lady Villers.
s lady seemed to take extreme pleasure in accosting
leus by the appellation of "friend, my good man, Mr.
your name?" and similar squibs of insult, with which osperous assail the unfortunate. Such random shots nflict the most galling wounds. However, friend, my an, and Mr. what's your name, disappointed this lady's artillery of effect. He seemed invulnerable, both to her ice, and to her affectation; for to be admired by even Dundas's contemned tutor, was not to be despised;
h at the very moment she supposed her haughtiness had impressed him with a sense of his own meanness, and a high conception of her dignity.

She jumped about the room; assumed infantine airs, played with Euphemia's lap-dog, fondled it, seated herself on the floor, and swept the floor with her fine flaxen tresses; but she performed the whole routine of captivation in vain; Thaddeus recollected having seen this pretty full grown baby, in her appropriate character of a profligate wife, pawning her own and her husband's property; he remembered this, and the united shafts of her charms and folly, fell unnoticed to the ground.

When Thaddeus took his leave, Miss Beaufort, as was her custom, retired for an hour to read in her dressing room, before she directed her attention to the toilet. She opened a book, and ran over a few pages of Lord St. Albin! but his reasoning was too abstracted for her present frame of mind, and she threw the volume down.

She dipped a pen in the ink-stand. Being a letter in debt to her guardian, she thought she could defray it now. She accomplished "Dear Sir," and stopped. Whilst she rested on her elbow, and heedless of what she was doing, she bit the feather of her quill to pieces, no other idea offered itself, than the figure of Thaddeus, sitting 'severe in youthful beauty!' She saw him surrounded by those contumelies which the unworthy bestow on the merit they can neither emulate or overlook.

Uneasy with herself she pushed the table away; and leaning her cheek on her arm gazed on the rainbow varieties of a beautiful pot of flowers which occupied the fire place. Even their gay colours appeared to fade before her sight, and present to her vacant eye the form of Thaddeus, with the melancholy air that shaded his movements. She turned round, but could not disengage herself from the spirit that was within her; his half suppressed sighs, seemed yet to thrill in her ear, and weigh on her heart.

"Excellent young man!" cried she, starting up, "Why are you so wretched? O! Lady Tinemouth, why have you told me so much of his virtues? Why have I convinced myself that what you said is true? Oh! why was I formed to love superior goodness?" The natural reply to these self-demanded questions, suggesting itself, she assented with a tear to the whisperings of her feelings, that when philosophy would banish the affections it is capable of filling the place.

She rung the bell for the maid.

"Marshal, who dines with Lady Dundas to-day?"

lieve Ma'am," replied the girl, "Mr. Lascelles, Lady , and the Marquis of Elsmere."

etest them all three!" cried Mary, with a petulance to he was little liable; "dress me how you like, I am nt to my appearance."

hal obeyed the commands of her lady who bent her a little volumne of poems written by Egerton Bridges, maid having fixed the last pearl comb in her beautiful claimed, "Dear Ma'am you are so pale to day! shall the least bit of rouge?"

" returned Mary, glancing a look over her languid , "no, Marshal, I appear as well as I desire. Any of passing unnoticed in company I despise is worth g. No one will be here this evening that I care to was mistaken; other company had been invited be- om the maid had mentioned; and Miss Beaufort con- rom seven o'clock till ten, the period at which the ladies table, annoyed to death by the insipid and pert com- s of the men.

of their subjectless and dragging conversation, she followed lady Dundas to the drawing-room; where her netting case, she took her station beneath one of res in a remote corner, hoping to find a retreat from eless nonsense of her ladyship's guests.

half an hour had elapsed, the gentlemen from below, by fresh company, thronged in fast; and, notwith- it was styled a family party, Miss Beaufort saw trange faces, among whom she observed an old cler- who was looking about for a chair. The yawning s threw himself along the only vacant sofa, just as the an approached.

Beaufort immediately resigned her place, and was on to another room, when the coxcomb springing up, permission to admire her work, and taking it from her, her, twisting the purse into a rope round his fingers, g how pretty it was, whilst he thrust (in his own his pretty hand into her eyes.

walked forward, smiling with contempt, till they the painted saloon; where the Miss Dundases were ngaged in conversation with the Marquis of Elsmere. lles, who trembled for his Golconda, at this sight briskly up. Mary, who did not wish to lose sight of e, while in the power of such a Lotharo, followed him, and placed herself against the arm of the sofa on which Euphemia sat.

Lascelles now bowed his scented locks to Diana in vain; Lord Elsmere was describing the heat at Newmarket, and the attention of neither lady could be drawn aside.

The beau became so irritated by the perfect neglect of Euphemia, and so nettled at her sister's overlooking him, that assuming a gay air he struck Miss Dundas's arm a smart stroke with Miss Beaufort's purse; and laughing to show the strong opposition between his broad white teeth, and the miserable mouth of his lordly rival; hoped to alarm him by his familiarity, and to obtain a triumph over the ladies by degrading them in the eyes of the peer.

"Miss Dundas," demanded he, "who the devil was that your sister walked with the other day in Portland place?"

"Me!" cried Euphemia, surprised.

"Aye," returned he, I was crossing Waymouth street, when I perceived you accost a strange looking man. You may remember, you sauntered with him as far as William Miller's. I would have joined you, but seeing the family standing in the balcony, I did not choose them to suppose, that perhaps I brought you into such low company?

"Who was it, Euphemia?" inquired Miss Dundas in a severe tone.

"I wonder he affects to be ignorant," answered her sister angrily, "he knows very well it was only Mr. Constantine."

"And who is Mr. Constantine?" demanded the marquis. Mr. Lascelles shrugged his shoulders.

"E'faith my lord a fellow that nobody knows; a teacher of languages, giving himself the air of a prince. A writer of poetry; and a man who will draw you, your house and dogs, if you will pay him for it."

Mary's heart swelled.

"What, a French emigrant?" drawled his lordship, dropping his lips; "and the lovely Euphemia wishes to soothe his sorrows."

"No, my lord," stammered Euphemia, "he is—he is ——"

"What!" interrupted Lascelles, with a malicious grin, "a wandering beggar; that thrusts himself into society, which may some day repay his insolence with chastisement! For those who encourage him, they had better beware of being scouted by the world. I understand that his chief protectress is Lady Tinemouth; and by the way of an auxiliary, Lady Sara Roos evinces that she is not quite inconsolable at the absence of her husband."

Mary, pale and trembling at the scandal his last words would have insinuated, had opened her lips to speak, when Miss Dundas (whose angry eyes darted from her sister to her lover) exclaimed, "Mr. Lascelles I know not what you mean. The subject you have taken up, is below my discussion; yet, I must confess, if Euphemia ever has disgraced herself so far as to be seen walking with a school-master, she deserves all you have said."

"And why might I not walk with him, sister?" asked the poor culprit, suddenly recovering from her confusion, and looking pertly up, "who knew that he was not a gentleman?"

"Every body, ma'am," interrupted Lascelles; "and when a young woman of fashion condescends to be seen equalizing herself with any creature depending on his wits for support, she is very likely to incur the contempt of her acquaintance, and censure of her friends."

"She is, Sir," said Mary, holding down her indignant heart, and forcing her countenance to appear serene; "for she ought to know, that those men of fashion, who have no wits either to be their support or ornament, if they did not proscribe talent from their circle, must soon find 'the greater glory dim the less.'"

"True madam," cried Lord Berrington, who, having entered during the contest, had stood unobserved till this moment; "and that gold and title, will prove mere dross and bubble, when struck by the Ithurial touch of Genius."

Mary turned round at the sound of his philanthropic voice, and gave him one of those glances which go immediately to the soul.

"Come, Miss Beaufort," cried he taking her hand, "I see the young musician, yonder, who has so recently astonished the public. I believe he is going to sing. Let us leave this ill natured corner, and seek harmony by his side."

Mary obeyed the impulse of his arm, and seating herself a few paces off the musical party, Berrington took his station behind her chair.

When the finest and most melting voice in the world, had ceased the last stanza of "From shades of night;" Mary's eyes full of admiration, and a feeling which rapid association rendered more intense, remained fixed on the singer: Lord Berrington smiled at the vivid expression of her countenance; and, as the inimitable Braham moved from the instrument, exclaimed.—"Come, come Miss Beaufort I won't allow that orphan boy to run away with all your attention; listen to m merits. Do you know, if it were not for my timely lectures, little Lascelles would grow the most insufferable gossip about town? There is not a match, nor a divorce near St. James's of which he cannot repeat to you all the whys and wherefores. I call him Sir Benjamin Backbite; and I believe he hates me worse than the devil."

"Such a man's dislike, rejoined Mary, "is the highest encomium he can bestow. I never yet heard him speak well of a person that did not resemble himself."

"And he is not consistently generous even there," resumed the Viscount; "I am not sure, that I have always heard him speak in the gentlest terms of Miss Dundas. Yet on this topic, I cannot quite blame him; for on my honor she provokes me beyond any woman I know."

"Many women," replied Mary smiling, "would esteem that a flattering instance of power."

"And like every thing that flatters," returned he, "it would tell a falsehood. A shrew can provoke the man who detests her. And for Miss Dundas," continued he, "notwithstanding her parade of learning, her judgment has not been taught to decide rightly; consequently she generally espouses the wrong side of the argument; and I am with somebody whose name I have forgotten; that any who knows Diana Dundas, never need be at a loss for a woman to call impertinent."

"You are not usually so severe my lord."

"I am not usually so severe, Miss Beaufort," answered he, 'but I see that you think for yourself; therefore I make no hesitation in speaking what I think—to you."

Mary bowed her head. Lady Dundas that moment beckoned him across the room. She compelled him to sit down to whist. He cast a rueful glance at Mary, and took a seat opposite his costly partner.

"That is a very worthy young man," observed the old clergyman, to whom Miss Beaufort, at the beginning of the evening had resigned her chair; "I presume madam, you have been honouring him with your conversation."

"Yes," returned Mary, noticing the benign countenance of the venerable speaker: "I have not had the pleasure of long knowing Lord Berrington, but what I have seen of his character is highly to his advantage."

"I was intimate in his father's house for years," rejoined the gentleman; "I knew his lordship from a boy. If he have faults, he owes them to his mother, who doated on him, and rather directed his care to the adornment of a really hand-rson, than to the cultivation of talents, which he has urnt to appreciate."

lieve Lord Berrington to be very sensible, and above humane;" returned Mary.
is so," replied the old gentleman; "yet, it was not till ned the age of twenty-two, that he appeared to know had any thing to do in the world, besides dressing and g on the fair. His taste directed the first, whilst the r of his disposition gave birth to the latter.—When on arrived at his title, he was about five and twenty.
for the death of his amiable parents who died in the nth, afforded him leisure to find his reason. He dis-that he had been acting a part beneath him; and he planted on the old stock, those excellent acquirements ind, which you see he possesses. In spite of this re-on," continued he, casting a good-humoured glance ove-coloured silk stockings, breeches and waistcoat of count; "you perceive first impressions will remain.
s dress, but he loves justice and philanthropy better."
s eulogy, Sir," said Mary, "affords me real pleasure.
know the name of the gentleman with whom I have our of conversing?"
name is Blackmore," returned he.
Blackmore?"
same."
as the same Dr. Blackmore, whose humanity had been rith the appearance of the Count Sobieski at the Hum-and who, being a rare visitor at Lady Dundas's, had y any chance, met a second time with the object c passion.
happy," returned Miss Beaufort, "in having the good to meet a gentleman, of whom I have so frequently y guardian express his sentiments of esteem."
!" replied he; "I have not seen him since the death of
; I hope that he and his son are well?"
fectly," replied she.
madam, I suppose are my lady's niece, Miss Beau-n, Sir."

ll I rejoice at this incident," rejoined he, pressing her
"I knew your mother when she was a lovely girl. She spend her summers with the late Lady Somerset, then eaufort, at the castle. It was there I had the honour of ing her friendship."

"I do not remember ever having seen my mother," replied the now thoughtful Mary. Dr. Blackmore, observing the expression of her countenance, smiled kindly and said, "I fear I am to blame here. This is a sad way of beginning an acquaintance to which I introduced myself. But your goodness must pardon me," continued he, "for I have so long accustomed myself to speak to them what I like, that sometimes, as in this case, I undesignedly inflict pain."

"Not in this case," returned Mary; "I shall always feel pleasure in listening to a friend of my mother's and particularly so, when he speaks in her praise."

The breaking up of the card tables, prevented any further conversation; and Lord Berrington again approached Miss Beaufort, exclaimed, as he perceived her companion, "Ah! my good doctor; what, you have presented yourself at this fair shrine? I declare, you eccentric folks may dare any thing.—Whilst you are free, Miss Beaufort," added he, turning to her, "adopt this bit of advice, which a good lady once gave me, and which I have implicitly followed, 'When you are young, get the character of an oddity, and it seats you in an easy chair for life.'"

Mary was interrupted in her reply, by a general stir among the company, who, now that cards were over, like bees and wasps, were swarming about the room, gathering and stinging as they passed.

At two, the house was cleared; and Mary, exhausted, threw herself on her pillow, to think, and dream of Thaddeus.

CHAPTER XXI.

If it be true what the vivid imaginations of poets have often asserted, that when the soul dreams, it is in the actual presence of those beings whose images present themselves to its slumbers, then have the spirits of Thaddeus and Mary been commingled at the hour of midnight; then has the young Sobieski again visited his distant country; again seen it victorious; again knelt before his sainted parent.

From such visions as these, did Thaddeus awake in the morning after having spent the preceding evening with Lady Tinemouth.

He had walked with her ladyship in Hide-Park till a late hour. By the mild light of the moon, which shone brightly through the still balmy air of a midsummer night, they took their way twice along the shadowy bank of the Serpentine.

There is a solemn appeal to the soul in the repose of nature, that "makes itself be felt." No syllable from either Thaddeus or the Countess, broke the universal silence. Thaddeus looked around on the clear expanse of water overshaded by the long reflection of the deepening woods: then raising his eyes to that beautiful planet, which has excited the tenderest sensations in every feeling breast, since the beginning of the world; he drew a deep sigh. The Countess echoed it.

"In such a night as this," said Thaddeus, in a low voice, as if afraid to disturb the sleeping deity of the place, "I used to walk the ramparts of Villanow, with my dear departed mother, and gaze on that lovely orb; when I was far distant from her I have looked at it from the door of my tent, and, fancying that her eyes were then fixed on the same object with my own, I found happiness in the idea."

Thaddeus felt a tear stealing down his cheek. That moon yet shone brightly, but his mother's eyes were closed in the grave.

"Villanow," repeated the Countess in a tone of surprise, "surely that was the seat of the great Palatine of Masovia! you have discovered yourself, Constantine! I am much mistaken if you be not his grandson, Thaddeus Sobieski?"

Thaddeus had allowed the remembrances pressing on his mind, to draw him into a speech, which he found had disclosed to the quick apprehension of the Countess, what his pride would for ever have concealed.

"I have indeed betrayed my secret;" cried he incapable of denying it, "but, dear Lady Tinemouth, as you value my feelings, never let it escape your lips. Having long considered you my best friend, loved you as a parent, I forgot in the recollection of my beloved mother, now no more, that I had withheld any of my history from you."

"Gracious Providence!" exclaimed her ladyship after a moment's pause, in which ten thousand admiring and pitying reflections thronged on her mind, "Is it possible? can it be the Count Sobieski, that brave and illustrious youth of whom every foreigner spoke with wonder? Can it be him that I behold in the poor unfriended Constantine?"

"Even so;" returned Thaddeus, pressing her hand; "my country is no more. I am now forgotten by the world, as I have been by fortune. I have nothing to do on earth, but to fulfil the few duties which friendship has enjoined; and then it will be indifferent to me how soon I am laid in its bosom."

"You are too young dear Constantine, (for I am yet to call you by that name,) to despair, of happiness being reserved for you."

"No, my dear Lady Tinemouth, I do not cheat myself with such hope; I am not so importunate with the gracious being who gave me life and reason. He bestowed on me for a while the tenderest connexions; a mother, a grandfather, friends, rank, honors, glory; all these were crushed in the fall of Poland; yet I survive. I only seek resignation and I have found it; it cost me many a struggle; but the contest was due to the decrees of that all-wise Creator, who gave my first years to happiness."

"Inestimable young man!" cried the countess, wiping the flowing tears from her eyes, "you teach misfortune dignity! Not when all Warsaw rose in a body to thank you as one of its bravest deliverers, not when the king received you in the senate with open arms; could you have appeared to me so worthy of admiration, as at this moment, when conscious of having been all this, you submit to the bitterest storms of fate, because you believe them to be the will of your Maker! Ah! little does Miss Beaufort think, when seated by your side, that she is conversing with the very hero whom she has so often wished to see!"

"Miss Beaufort!" echoed Thaddeus, his heart glowing with delight. "Did she ever hear of me by the name of Sobieski?"

"Who has not," returned the Countess, "every heart that could be interested by suffering virtue, has heard, and must well remember, the calamities of your country. Whilst the newspapers of the day informed us of the struggles which Poland made for her liberty; they noticed among the first of her champions, the Palatine of Masovia, Kosciuszko, and yourself. Many an evening have I spent with Lady Somerset and Mary Beaufort, lamenting the fate of that devoted kingdom."

During this declaration, a variety of transporting emotions agitated the mind of Thaddeus; till recollecting with a bitter pang, the shameless ingratitude of Pembroke, and the cruel possibility of being recognised by the Earl of Tinemouth as his son, he exclaimed. "My dearest madam, I entreat that what I have revealed to you, may never be divulged! Miss Beaufort's friendship would indeed be happiness; but I can ıase even that, at tne expense of feelings which are my life."

," cried the Countess, "Is not your name and all ant ideas, an honour that the proudest man might eus pressed her ladyship's hand gratefully to his are kind! very kind! yet I cannot retract. Confide y Tinemouth, in the justice of my resolution. I could cold pity; I could not bear the heartless comments

, who, pretending to compassion, would load me with sense of my calamities. Besides, there are persons ıd, who are so much the objects of my aversion, that rather die, than have them know I exist. There-these grounds let me implore you to keep my se-

Tinemouth saw by the earnestness of his manner, ought to comply; and without further hesitation,
all the silence on the subject he could require.
ong, moonlight conversation, by awakening those remembrances, which were cherished, though hidden osom, gave birth to an effort of imagination that within the rapid series of his tumultuous dreams, the f every being whom he had ever loved, or now con-regard with interest.
ding next morning towards Harley-street he ponwhat had happened, and pleased that he had, though litatedly, paid the just compliment of his entire confithe uncommon friendship of the Countess, he arriv-ly Dundas's door before he was sensible of the ground assed over; and in a few minutes afterwards he was nto his accustomed purgatory.
the servant opened the study door, Miss Euphemia in alone. Thaddeus recoiled, but he could not ree in Mr. Constantine," cried the little beauty, in a one; "my sister has gone to the riding school with celles. Miss Beaufort wanted me to drive out with my mother; but I preferred waiting for you."

ount bowed; and almost retreating with fear of what xt be said, he gladly heard a thundering knock at
, and, a moment after the voice of Miss Dundas as-the stairs.
d just opened his books, when she entered, followed by her lover. Panting under a heavy riding-habit, she flung herself on a sofa, and began to villify "the odious heat of Fozard's odious place," and telling Euphemia she would play truant to-day, ordered her to attend to her lessons.

Owing to the warmth of the weather, Thaddeus came out this morning without boots; and it being the first time that the fine proportion of his limbs had been seen by any of the present company, excepting Euphemia; Lascelles, bursting with a disdain of such insignificant distinctions, (which he would not call envy,) measured the Count's beautiful leg with his insolent eyes; then, declaring he was quite in a furnace, took the corner of his glove, and waving it to and fro, half muttered, "Come gentle air."

"The fairer Lascelles cries!" exclaimed Euphemia, looking off her exercise.

"What? does your master teach you wit?" drawled the coxcomb, with a particular emphasis.

Thaddeus affecting not to hear, continued to direct his pupil.

The indefatigable Lascelles having observed the complaisance with which the Count always regarded Miss Beaufort, determined the goad should fret, and drawing out of his pocket the netting which he had taken the night before from Mary, exclaimed, "'Fore heaven, here is my little Beaufort's purse."

Thaddeus started, and unconciously looking up, beheld the well-knewn work of Mary, dangling in the hand of Lascelles. He felt sensations unknown to him; his eyes became dim, and hardly knowing what he saw or said, he persued the lesson with increased velocity.

The malicious puppy, having found his malice take effect; with a careless air, threw his clumsy limbs on the vacant part of the sofa, which Miss Dundas had quited to seat herself nearer the window, and cried in a voice of sudden recollection,

"By the bye, that Miss Mary Beaufort, when she chooses to be sincere, is a sad little aristocrat."

"You may as well tell me," replied Miss Dundas, with a contemptuous curl of her lip, "that she is the Empress of Russia."

"I beg your pardon," cried he, raising his voice at his judgment being doubted; "I will prove it to you. When she gave me this gew-gaw," added he, rumbling the purse in his hand, "she told me an everlasting story about some friend of hers, whose music master, having mistaken some condescensions on her part, had dared to snatch a kiss from her snowy fingers as they were flying over the strings of her harp. You cannot ıe how Beaufort's pretty eyes blazed as she related this I verily believe, had it been herself, she would have poor Tweedledum, a flourish across the cheek." s Dundas laughed.

hese energetic young ladies possess not the gentlest ns in the world; and after Miss Beaufort's outrageous ast night to you, I should not wonder at any indecorum ight commit."
utrageous to me!" echoed the fop, dipping the end of the g into Diana's lavender bottle and dabbing his temples, was always too civil by half. I hate forward girls."
ıddeus shut the large dictionary that lay before him, with ınce that made the puppy start; and rising hastily from air, with a face as red as crimson, was taking up his hat
the door opened, and Mary appeared.
rhite chip hat was resting lightly on the glittering tresses waved over her forehead: whilst her lace shade, gently ıposed by the air, half veiled and half revealed her ul figure. She entered with a smile, walking up to the f the table where Thaddeus was standing inquired after ieud's health. He answered her in a voice unusually
ed. All that he had been told by the Countess of her able opinion of him; and the slander he had just heard Diana's lover, were at once present to his mind.
was yet speaking when Miss Beaufort casually looking ds the other side of the room, saw her purse still acting rt of a handkerchief, in the hand of Mr. Lascelles.
ook, Mr. Constantine," said she, gaily tapping his arm ıer parasol, "how the most precious things may be del! There is the netting that you have so often admired hich I intended for lady Tinemouth's pocket, debased to office of Mr. Lascelles's napkin."
ou gave it to him, Miss Beaufort," cried Miss Dundas;
after that, surely he may use it as he values it!"
I could have given it to Mr. Lascelles, madam, I should have taken notice of its fate."
s Dundas, believing what her lover had advanced, was ased at Mary, for having by presents, interfered with her danglers; and rather angrily replied, "Mr. Las-said you gave it to him; and certainly you would not ate a word against his veracity?"
o, not insinuate," returned Miss Beaufort, "but affirm, e has forgotten his veracity, at least in his statement."

Lascelles yawned—"Lord bless me ladies, how you quarrel! You will disturb Monsieur."

"Mr. Constantine," returned Mary, blushing with indignation, "cannot be disturbed by nonsense."

Thaddeus again took his hat; bowed to his lovely champion, with an expression of countenance which he little suspected had passed from his heart to his eyes, he was preparing to take his leave, when Euphemia requested him to inform her whether she had folded down the right pages for the next exercise. He drew near, and was leaning over her chair to look at the book, when she whispered, "don't be hurt at what Lascelles says; he is always jealous of any body that is handsomer than himself."

Thaddeus bowed to her with a face of scarlet; for, on meeting the eyes of Mary, he saw that she had heard this intended comforter as well as himself: and uttering a few incoherent sentences to both ladies he hurried out of the house.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Count Sobieski was prevented from paying his customary visit next morning in Harley-street, by the sudden illness of the general, who, at seven o'clock had been struck with a fit of the palsy.

When Dr. Cavendish beheld the poor old man stretched along the bed, and hardly exhibiting signs of life, he pronounced it to be a death-stroke—At this sentence, Thaddeus turning deadly pale, staggered to his seat, with his eyes fixed on the altered features of his friend. Dr. Cavendish took his hand.

"Recollect yourself, my dear sir! Happen when it will, death must be a release. But do not expect it for some time, he may yet linger for a week or a fortnight."

"Not in pain, I hope!" said Thaddeus, rising.

"No;" returned the doctor, "probably he will remain as you now see him, and expire like the last glimmer of a dying taper."

The benevolent Cavendish proceeded to give particular directions to Thaddeus and Mrs. Robson, who promised to act as nurse; and then with regret left the stunned Count to the melancholy task of watching by the bed-side of his venerable friend.

Thaddeus now retained no thought that was not rivetted on the emaciated form before him. Whilst the unconscious invalid struggled for respiration, he listened to his short and convulsed breathing, with sensations that seemed to tear the strings of his own breast. Unable to bear it longer, he moved opposite to the fire, and seating himself with his pallid face, and aching head supported on his arm which rested on a plain deal table, he remained, meeting no other suspension from deep meditation, than the now and then appearance of Mrs. Robson on tiptoes, peeping in, and inquiring whether he wanted any thing.

From this depressing reverie, he was roused next morning at nine o'clock, by the entrance of Dr. Cavendish. Thaddeus seized his hand with the eagerness of anxiety, "he has not been worse, my dear Sir, may I hope that"—

The doctor, not suffering him to finish with what he hoped, shook his head, and waving his hand in sign of the vanity of that hope, advanced to the side of the general and felt his pulse. His opinion exactly coincided with what he had declared before, differing only in one particular, that he now saw no absolute threatening of an immediate dissolution.

"Poor Butzou!" said Thaddeus, as the doctor withdrew, putting the general's motionless hand to his quivering lips, "I never will leave thee! I will watch by thee, thou last relic of my country!"

With anguish at his heart, he wrote a few hasty lines to the Countess: Then addressing Miss Dundas he offered as the reason for his late and continued absence, the danger of his friend.

His note found Miss Dundas attended by her constant shadow, Mr. Lascelles, lady Villiers, and two or three more fine ladies and gentlemen, besides Euphemia and Miss Beaufort, who with pensive countenances, were waiting the arrival of its writer.

When Miss Dundas had taken the billet off the silver salver on which her man presented it, and had looked at the superscription, she threw it into the lap of Lascelles.

"There," cried she, "is an excuse I suppose, from Mr. Constantine, for his impertinence in not coming here yesterday. Read it Lascelles."

"'Fore Gad, I wouldn't touch it for an Earldom!" exclaimed the affected puppy, jerking it on the table, "it might infect me with hypocondriacs. Pray Phemy do you peruse it."

Euphemia in her eagerness to learn what had detained

Mr. Constantine, neglected the insolence of the request, and hastily breaking the seal, read as follows:

"Mr. Constantine hopes that a sudden and dangerous disorder, which has attacked the life of a very dear friend with whom he resides, will be a sufficient appeal to the humanity of the Miss Dundases, and obtain his pardon for relinquishing the honor of attending them yesterday and to-day."

"Dear me!" cried Euphemia, piteously, "how sorry I am; I dare say it is that white haired old gentleman we saw in the park. You remember Mary he was sick?"

"Probably:" returned Miss Beaufort, with her eyes fixed on the agitated hand-writing of Thaddeus.

"Throw the letter into the street, Phemy!" cried Miss Dundas, affecting sudden terror, "Who knows but that it is a fever the man has got, and we may all catch our deaths."

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed Mary in a voice of real alarm: but it was for Thaddeus: not fear of any infectious which the paper might bring to herself.

"Lascelles, take away the filthy scrawl from Phemy How can you be so headstrong, child?" cried Diana, snatching the letter from her sister, and throwing it out of the window, "I declare you are sufficient to provoke a saint."

"Then you may keep your temper, Di," returned Euphemia, with a sneer, "you are far enough from that title."

Miss Dundas made a very angry reply, which was retaliated with another; and a still more noisy and disagreeable altercation might have taken place, had not a good humoured lad, a brother-in-law of lady Villiers, in hopes of calling off the attention of the sisters, exclaimed, "Bless me Miss Dundas, your little dog has pulled a folded sheet of paper from under that stand of flowers! Perhaps it may be of consequence?

"Fly! take it up, George!" cried Lady Villiers, "Esop will tear it to atoms while you are asking questions."

After a chase round the room, over chairs and through tables, George Villiers at length plucked the devoted piece of paper out of the dog's mouth; and, as Miss Beaufort was gathering up her working materials, to leave the room, opened it and cried in a voice of triumph, "By Jove it is a copy of verses!"

"Verses!" demanded Euphemia, feeling in her pocket and colouring, "Let me see them."

"That you shan't," roared Lascelles, catching them out of the boy's hand, "if they be your writing, we will have them."

"Help me, Mary!" cried Euphemia, turning to Miss Beaufort, "I know that nobody is a poet in this house but myself. They must be mine, and I will have them."

"Surely, Mr. Lascelles," said Mary, compassionating the poor girl's anxiety, you will not be so rude as to detain them from their right owner?"

"O! but I will," cried he, mounting on a table, to get out of Euphemia's reach, who now half crying, tried to snatch at the paper. "Let me alone, Miss Phemy. I will read them; so here goes it."

Miss Dundas laughed at her sister's confused looks whilst Lascelles prepared to read in a loud voice, the following verses. They had been hastily scribbled in pencil by Thaddeus, a long time ago; who having put them by mistake with some other papers, into his pocket, had dropped them next day, in taking out his handkerchief at Lady Dundas's. Lascelles cleared his throat with three hems, then raising his right hand with a flourish of action, in a very pompous tone, began—

"Like one, whom Etna's torrent fires have sent Far from the land, where his first youth was spent.
Who, inly drooping on a foreign shore
Broods over scenes which charm his eyes no more
And while his country's ruin wakes the groan,
Yearns for the buried hut, he called his own:
So driv'n, O Poland! from thy ravag'd plains,
So mourning o'er thy sad, but loved remains,
A friendless wretch I wander through the world,
From Fame, from Grandeur, and from Comfort hurl'd.
O! not, that each long night my weeping eyes
Sink into sleep, unlul'd by Pity's sighs;
Not, that in bitter tears my bread is steep'd:
Tears drawn by insult on my sorrows heap'd:
Not, that my thoughts recall a mother's grave;—
Recall the sire I would have died to save,
Who fell before me bleeding on the field,
Whilst I in vain opposed the fruitless shield,—
Ah! not for these I grieve!—Tho' mental wo
More deadly still, scarce Fancy's self could know;
O'er want and private griefs the soul can climb,
Virtue subdues the one, the other Time;—
But at his country's fall the patriot feels
A grief, no time, no drug, no reason heals.—

Mem'ry! remorseless murderer! whose voice Kills as it sounds; who never says rejoice!
To my deserted heart, by joy forgot;
Thou pale, thou midnight spectre, haunt me not!
Thou dost but point to where sublimely stands
A glorious temple rear'd by freedom's hands,
Circled with palms and laurels, crowned with light,
Darting Truth's piercing sun on moral sight;
Then, rushing on, leagued fiends of hellish birth,
Levelling the mighty fabric with the earth!
Slept the red bolt of Vengeance in that hour,
When virtuous freedom fell the slave of power!
Slumbered the God of Justice! that no brand
Blasted, with blazing wing, the impious band.—
Dread God of Justice! to thy will I kneel, Tho' still my filial heart must bleed and feel,
Tho' still the proud convulsive throb will rise,
When fools my country's wrongs and woes despise;
When low soul'd Pomp, mean Wealth, that pity gives,
Which Virtue ne'er bestows, and ne'er receives,—
That pity, stabbing where it vaunts to cure,
Which barbs the dart of want and makes it sure;—
How far remov'd from what the feeling breast,
Yields boastless, quench'd in sighs to the distress'd
Which whispers sympathy, with tender fear,
And almost dreads to pour its balmy tear—
But such, I know not now—unseen, alone,
I breathe the heavy sigh, I draw the groan;
And madd'ning, turn to days of liveliest joy,
When o'er my native hills I cast mine eye,
And said exulting,—"Freemen here shall sow
"The seed, that soon in tossing gold shall glow!
"While Plenty, led by Liberty, shall rove
"Gay and rejoicing, through the land they love;
"And 'mid their loaded vines, the peasant see
"His wife, his children, breathing out—we're free!"
But now, O wretched land! above thy plains,
Half viewless thro' the gloom, vast Horror reigns—
No happy peasant o'er this blazing hearth,
Devotes the supper-hour to love and mirth;
No flowers on Liberty's pure altar bloom,
Alas! they wither now, and strew her tomb!—
From the great book of Nations fiercely rent,
My country's page to Lethe's stream is sent—sent in vain—Th' historic muse shall raise,

r wrong'd Samatria's cause, the voice of praise,
ll sing her nobly struggling, e'en in death;
blast her royal robbers' bloody wreath!"*

It must be Constantine's!" cried Euphemia in a voice of rised delight, when the reader had finished, and springing o take the paper out of his hand.
I dare say it is," answered the ill-natured Lascelles, hold-it above his head, "come you shall have it, only let us
it again; it is so mighty pretty, so very lackadasical!"
Give it me," cried Euphemia quite angry.
Don't, Lascelles," exclaimed Miss Dundas; "the man
t be a perfect idiot to write such rhodomontade."
O! it is delectable," returned her lover, opening the pa-again, "it would make a charming ditty! Come, I will
it. Shall it be the tune of The babes in the Wood, or y Chase, or the Beggar of Bethnal Green?" Senseless, unfeeling wretch!" exclaimed Mary, rising her chair, where she had been striving to subdue those tions, with which every line in the poem had possessed heart.
Brute," cried the enraged Euphemia, taking courage at Beaufort's unusual warmth, "I will have the paper."
You shan't," answered the malicious coxcomb, and raising arms higher than her reach, he tore it into a hundred s.
this sight, Mary no longer able to contain herself,
ed out of the room; and hurrying to her own chamber, herself upon the bed, where she gave way to a paroxism
ars that shook her almost to suffocation.
uring the first burst of her indignation, her agitated spirit hed every appellation of abhorrence and reproach, on elles and his malignant mistress. Then, wiping her ng eyes she said, "Yet can I wonder when I compare tantine with what they are? The man who dares to be ous and great, and appears so, arms the self love of all non characters against him."
ch being her meditations, she refused to join the family at er; and it was not till evening, that she felt herself at all to treat the ill natured group with decent civility.
e next morning, Miss Beaufort (to avoid spending more hours than were absolutely necessary, in the company of a woman whom she now loathed) borrowed lady Dundas's sedan chair, and ordering it to lady Tinemouth's, found her ladyship at home, alone, and evidently much agitated.

* These lines were furnished by a friend.

"I intrude on you, lady Tinemonth!" said Mary, observing her looks, and withdrawing from the offered seat.

"No, my dear Miss Beaufort," replied her ladyship when the servant closed the door, "I am glad you have come. I assure you, I have few pleasures in solitude. Read that letter," added she, putting one into the hand of Mary, "it has just conveyed one of the cruelest stabs that ever was offered from a son to the heart of his mother. Read it; and you will not be surprised at finding me in the state you see me."

The Countess looked on her paralyzed hands as she spoke; and Mary, taking the paper from her, sat down, and read to herself the following letter.

"To the Right Honourable the Countess of Tinemouth.

"Madam,

"I am commissioned by the Earl, my father, to inform you, that if you have lost all regard for your own character, he considers that some respect is due to the mother of his son; therefore he watches your conduct.

"He has been apprised of your frequent meetings during these many months, in Grosvenor-place, and at other people's houses, with an obscure foreigner, your declared lover. The Earl wished to suppose this false, till your shameless behaviour became so flagrant, that he esteems it neither worthy of doubt nor indulgence.

"With his own eyes he saw you, four nights ago alone with this man in Hyde-Park. Such demonstration is dreadful. Your proceedings are abominable! and if you do not, without further parley, set off either to Craighall, in Cornwall, or the Wolds, you shall receive a letter from my sister as well as myself, to tell the dishonoured lady Tinemouth, how much she merits her daughter's contempt, added to that of

HARWOLD."

"And what do you mean to do, my dear madam!" inquired Mary, shocked at this instance of an ingratitude disgraceful to human nature.

"I will obey my lord and his children," returned the Countess bursting into tears, "my last action shall be in obedience to their will. I cannot live long, and when I am dead, perhaps the Earl's vigilance may be satisfied; perhaps some kind friend may then plead my cause in my daughter's heart. One cruel line from her would kill me. I will at least avoid the completion of that threat by leaving town to-morrow night."

"So soon! but I hope to Cornwall?"

"No," replied her ladyship, "Craighall is too near Plymouth. I shall determine on the Wolds. Yet why should I have a choice! It is almost a matter of indifference to what spot I am banished, in what place I am to die. Any where I shall be equally remote from a friend."

Mary's heart was oppressed when she entered the room. Lady Tinemouth's sorrows seemed to give her a licence to weep. She took her ladyship's hand, and with difficulty sobbed out this inarticulate offer, "Take me, dear lady Tinemouth; I am sure my guardian will be happy to permit me to be with you where and how long you like."

"Dear Mary," replied the Countess, kissing her wet cheek, "I thank you from my heart; but I cannot take so ungenerous an advantage of your goodness, as to consign your tender nature to the harassing task of attending on sorrow and sickness. How strangely different may even amiable dispositions be rendered! Maria Egerton is better framed for such an office. Kind as she is, the hilarity of her disposition does not allow the sympathy she bestows on others, either to injure her mind or her body."

Mary interrupted her. "I should be grieved my dear Countess, to believe that my very aptitude to serve my friends, will prove the first reason why I should be denied that pleasure. It is only in scenes of affliction that friendship is tried and declares its truth. If Miss Egerton were not going with you, I should certainly insist on putting my affection to that ordeal."

"You mistake, my sweet friend," returned her ladyship, "Maria is forbidden to remain any longer with me. You have overlooked the postscript to Lord Harwold's letter, else you must have seen the whole of my cruel situation. Turn over the leaf."

Miss Beaufort opened the sheet, and read these few lines, which being written on the interior part of the paper, had escaped her sight.

"Go where you will it is our especial injunction that you leave a Miss Egerton behind you; whom we hear has been the embassadress in this shocking intrigue. If we learn that you disobey, and persist in such audacity, it shall be worse for you in every respect; as it will convince us beyond a possibility of doubt, how uniform is the turpitude of your conduct."

Lady Tinemouth grasped Miss Beaufort's hand as she threw the barbarous scrawl on the table.

"And that, Mary, is from a son for whom I felt all a mother's agonies: all a mother's love? Had he died the first hour in which he saw the light, what a mass of guilt might he not have escaped! It is he," added she, in a lower voice, and looking wildly round, "that breaks my heart. I could have borne his father's perfidy! but insult, oppression, from a child! Oh, Mary, you know not its bitterness."

Mary could only answer with her tears.

After a pause of near a quarter of an hour, in which the Countess strove to tranquilize her spirits, she resumed in a more composed voice.

"Excuse me for an instant, my dear Miss Beaufort; I must write to Mr. Constantine. I have yet to inform him that my absence is to be added to his other misfortunes."

With her eyes raining down upon the paper, she took up a pen, and having hastily written a few lines, was sealing them, when Mary looking up, hardly conscious of the words which escaped her lips, said, with anguished eagerness, "Lady Tinemouth, you know much of that noble and unhappy young man?" her eye irresolutely and her cheek glowing, awaited an answer of the Countess, who for a moment continued to gaze on the letter she held in her hand as if in profound thought: then all at once raising her head, and regarding the now downcast face of Mary, with tenderness, replied in a tone which conveyed the deep interest of her heart.

"I do, Mary. He has reposed his griefs in my friendship and honour, therefore I must hold them sacred."

"I will not ask you to betray them," returned Mary in a faultering voice, "yet I cannot help lamenting his sufferings, and esteem the fortitude with which he supports his fall."

The Countess looked stedfastly on her fluctuating countenance. "Has Constantine, my dear Miss Beaufort, insinuated to you, that he ever was otherwise than he now appears?"

Mary could not reply. She would not trust her lips with words, but shook her head in sign that he had not. Lady Tinemouth was too well read in the human heart, to doubt for an instant the cause of Miss Beaufort's question and consequent emotion. Feeling that something was due to anxiety so disinterested and noble, she took her passive hand and said, "Mary you have guessed rightly. Though I am not authorized to tell you the real name of Constantine, nor the particulars of his history; let this satisfy your generous heart, that it can never be more honourably employed, than in compassionating calamities which ought to wreath his young brow with glory."

Mary's eyes streamed afresh, whilst her exulting soul seemed ready to rush from her bosom.

"Mary," continued the Countess, warmed by the recollection of his excellence; "you have no need to blush at the interest which you take in this amiable Constantine. Every trial of spirit which could have tortured youth or manhood, has been endured by him with the firmness of a hero. Ah, my sweet friend," added the Countess, pressing the hand of the confused Mary, who ashamed and conscious that her behaviour betrayed how dearly she considered him, had covered her face with her handkerchief; "when you are disposed to believe that a man is as great as his titles and demands assert, examine with a nice observance, whether his pretensions be real or artificial. Imagine him disrobed of splendour and struggling with the world's inclemencies. If his character cannot stand this ordeal, he is only a pageant of pomp, inflated and garnished; and it is reasonable to punish his arrogance with contempt. But, on the reverse, when like Constantine, he rises from the ashes of fortune in a brighter blaze of virtue; then dearest girl," cried the Countess, encircling her with her arms, "it is the sweetest privilege of loveliness, to console and bless so rare a being."

Mary raised her deluged face from the bosom of her friend; and, clasping her hands together with trepidation and anguish, implored her to be as faithful to her secret, as she had proved herself to Constantine's: "I would sooner die," added the agitated Mary, "than have him know my rashness, perhaps my indelicacy; let me possess his esteem, Lady Tinemouth; let him suppose that I only esteem him! more, I should shrink from. I have seen him beset by some of my sex; and to be classed with them! to have him imagine that my affectation is like their's! I could not bear it—I entreat you, let him, respect me!"

The impetuosity, and almost despair, with which Miss Beaufort uttered these incoherent sentences, pierced to the soul of Lady Tinemouth. How different was the spirit of this pure and dignified love to the wild passion, which she had seen shake the frame of Lady Sara Roos!

They remained silent for some time.

"May I see your ladyship to-morrow?" asked Mary, drawing her cloak about her.

"I fear not;" replied the Countess, "I leave this house to-morrow."

Mary rose; her lips, hands, and feet trembled so that she could hardly stand. Lady Tinemouth threw her arm round her waist, and kissing her forehead, said, "Heaven bless you my dear Miss Beaufort! may all the wishes of your innocent heart be gratified!"

The Countess supported her to the door. Mary hesitated an instant, then flinging her snowy arms over her ladyship's neck in a voice scarcely audible, articulated, "Only tell me—Does he love Euphemia?"

Lady Tinemouth strained her to her breast; "No, my dearest girl; I am certain, both from what I have heard him say, and observed in his eyes, that had he dared to love any one, you would have been the object of his choice."

How Mary got into Lady Dundas's chair, she had no recollection, so completely was she absorbed in the recent scene. Her mind was perplexed; and her heart ached; and she arrived in Harley-street so much disordered and unwell, as to oblige her to retire immediately to her room, with the excuse of a violent pain in her head.

This interview with Miss Beaufort, induced lady Tinemouth to destoy the note that she had written to Thaddeus, purposing before night, to frame another, better calculated to produce comfort to all parties. What she declared to Mary respecting the state of the Count's affections, was sincere.

She had early penetrated through the veil of bashfulness, with which Miss Beaufort had obscured that countenance, so usually the tablet of her soul. The Countess easily translated the quick receding of Mary's eye, whenever Thaddeus turned his attention towards her; the confused reply that followed any unexpected question from his lips; and above all the unheeded sighs heaved by her, when he left the room, or when his name was mentioned during his absence. These symptoms too truly revealed to Lady Tinemouth the state of her young friend's bosom.

But the circumstances being different, her observations on the Count were not nearly so conclusive. Mary had absolutely given the empire of her happiness, with her heart into his hands. Thaddeus wished that his ruined hopes had not prevented him from laying his at her feet. Therefore, not surrendered his imagination to a passion, which, in tuation he considered as madness, he was unembar-in her presence, and regarding her as a being be-his reach, conceived no suspicion, that she entertained earer thought of him than what mere philanthropy authorise.

contemplated her unequalled beauty, graces, talents rtues, with an admiration bordering on idolatry; yet his flew from the confession that he loved her; and it was ıtil reason demanded of his candour, why he had felt a ɔn seeing Mary's purse in the hands of Mr. Lascelles, ith a glowing cheek, he owned to himself, he was jealous;
lthough he had not presumed to elevate one wish to the possession of Miss Beaufort; yet, when Lascelles ɔd her name on his tongue, he found how poignant be the wound in his peace, should she ever give her ɔ another.

founded at this discovery of a passion, the seeds of he supposed had been crushed by the weight of his tunes, he proceeded homewards, with sensations not far ıg from those of the dreamer, who sinks into a light but sing slumber, and full of terror, doubts whether he be ıg or awake.

sudden illness of General Butzou, having put these to flight, Thaddeus was sitting on the bedside, with his ıs thoughts fixed on the pale spectacle of mortality be-im, when Nanny brought in a letter from the Countess.
ok it, and going to the window, undrew the curtain,
he read with mingled pain and pleasure the following

"To Mr. Constantine.

know not my dear Count, when I shall be permitted to u again; perhaps never on this side of the grave!
nce heaven has denied me the tenderness of my own ɔn, it would have been a comfort to me might I have con-to act a parent's part by you. But my cruel lord and ɔre cruel son, jealous of the consolation I met in the r of my few friends, command me to quit London: and ave ever made it a system to obey their injunctions r, I shall go.

pierces me to the soul, my dear son! (allow my maternal to call you by that name!) it distresses me deeply, that ompelled to leave the place where you are: neither can

I see you prior to my departure, for I quit town to-morrow afternoon.

"Write to me often my loved Sobieski: your letters will be some alleviation during the fulfilment of my hard duty.

"Wear the enclosed gold chain for my sake: it is one of two given me a long time ago by Miss Beaufort. If I have not mistaken you, the present will now possess a double value in your estimation: indeed it ought. Sensibility and thankfulness, being properties of your nature, they will not deny a lively gratitude to the generous interest with which that amiable young woman regards your fate. It is impossible that the avowed Count Sobieski (whom a year ago, I remember her animated fancy painted in the most romantic colours) could excite more of her esteem, than I know she has bestowed on the melancholy and untitled Constantine.

"She is all nobleness and affection. Although I am sensible that she will leave much behind her in London to regret, she insists on accompanying me to the Wolds. Averse to transgress so far on her goodness, I resolutely refused her offer till this evening, I received so warm and urging a letter from the kind girl, that I can no longer withhold my consent.

"Indeed, this lovely creature's active friendship proves of high consequence to me now, situated as I am with regard to a new whim of the Earl's. Had she not benevolently presented herself, in obedience to my lord's commands, I should have been obliged to go alone: he having taken some wild antipathy to Miss Egerton, whose company he has interdicted. At any rate her parents would not have allowed me her society much longer, as Mr. Montresor is to return this month.

"I shall not be easy my dear Count, till I hear from you. Pray write soon; and inform me of every particular respecting the poor General; is he likely to recover?

"In all things, my beloved son, in which I can serve you, remember, that I expect you to call on me as a mother. Your own could hardly have regarded you with deeper tenderness, than does your affectionate and faithful.

ADELIZA TINEMOUTH.

"Grosvenor Place,

"Thursday, midnight.

"Direct to me, at Harwold park, Wolds, Lincolnshire.

Several opposite emotions discomposed the mind of Thaddeus, whilst reading this epistle. Increased abhorrence of the man, whom he believed to be incontestibly his father, united with regret arising from the proposed departure of Lady Tinemouth, could neither subdue the balmy effects of her maternal affection, nor wholly check that thrill which the unusual mentioning of Miss Beaufort's name made throb in his heart, and paint his cheeks with crimson. He read the sentence that contained the assurances of her friendship, a third time.

"Delicious poison!" cried he, kissing the paper, "If adoring thee, lovely Mary, be added to my other sorrows, I shall be resigned! There is sweetness even in the thought. Could I credit all which my dear Lady Tinemouth affirms, the conviction that I possess one kind solicitude in the mind of Miss Beaufort, would be ample compensation for—"

He did not finish the sentence, but sighing profoundly, rose from his chair.

"For any thing, except beholding her the wife of another!" this was the sentiment with which his heart panted. Thaddeus had never known a selfish feeling in his life; and this first instance of his wishing that good unappropiated, which he might not himself enjoy, made him start.

"There is a fault in my heart, a dreadful one!" Dissatisfied with himself, he was preparing to answer her ladyship's letter, when, turning to the date, he discovered that it had been written on Thursday night; and in consequence of Nanny's neglect, in not calling at the coffee house, had been delayed a day and a half before it reached his hands.

His disappointment at this accident was severe. She was gone, and Mary along with her.

"Then indeed I am unfortunate!" said he, holding the chain in his hand, and looking on it, "I am at once deprived of all that rendered my forlorn existence in this town tolerable."

He put the chain round his neck; and with a true lover-like feeling, thought it warmed the heart, which mortification had chilled: but the fancy was evanescent, and he again turned to watch the fading life of his friend.

During the lapse of a few days, in which the general appeared merely to breathe; Thaddeus, instead of his attendance, dispatched regular notes to Harley-street. In answer to these excuses, he commonly received little tender billets from Euphemia; the strain of which he seemed totally to overlook, by the cold respect that he evinced in his diurnal apologies for absence.

This young lady was so full of lamentation over the troubles which her elegant tutor must endure in watching his sick friend, that she never thought it worth her while to mention any other creature in the house except herself and her commisseration. Thaddeus longed to inquire about Miss Beaufort; but the more he wished it the greater reluctance he felt to write her name.

Things were in this situation, when one evening as he was reading by the light of a solitary candle in his little sitting-room, the door opened, and Nanny stepped in followed by a person wrapped up in a large black cloak. Thaddeus immediately rose.

"A lady, Sir," said Nanny, curtsying.

The moment the girl withdrew, the visitor cast herself into a chair, and sobbing aloud, seemed in violent agitation. The Count, astonished and alarmed, approached her, and though she was unknown, offered her every assistance in his power.

Catching hold of the hand, which with the greatest respect he extended towards her, she instantly displayed to his dismayed sight, the features of lady Sara Roos.

"Merciful heaven!" exclaimed he, involuntarily starting back.

"Do not cast me off, Constantine!" cried she, clasping his arm, and looking up to him with a face of anguish, bathed in tears. "On you alone, I now depend for happiness! for existence."

A cold damp stood on the forehead of her auditor. A tremor shook him from head to foot.

"Dear Lady Sara, what am I to understand by this emotion? Has any thing dreadful happened? Is Captain Roos——?"

Lady Sara shuddered, and still grasping his hand, answered in words, every one of which palsied the heart of Thaddeus with horror;—"He is coming home.—He is now at Portsmouth—O Constantine? I am not yet so debased, as to live with him, when my heart is yours."

At this shameful declaration, Thaddeus clenched his teeth in fearful agony; and striking his hand upon his closed eyes, to shut her from his sight, he turned suddenly round, and walked towards another part of the room.

Lady Sara followed him. Her cloak having fallen off, now displayed her fine form in all the fervour of grief and distraction; she wrung her snowy arms in despair; and, with accents rendered more piercing by the anguish of her mind, exclaimed, "What? You hate me? You throw me from you? Cruel, barbarous Constantine! Can you drive from your feet the woman who adores you? Can you cast her who is without a home into the streets?"

Thaddeus felt his hand wet with her tears; he fixed his eyes upon her with almost delirious horror. Her hat being off, gave a loose to her long black hair, which falling in masses over her shoulders and eyes, gave such additional wildness to the imploring and frantic expression of those eyes, as distracted his soul.

"Rise madam! For Heaven's sake, lady Sara!" and he stooped to support her up.

"Never," cried she covering her face with her hands, "never! till you promise to protect me.—My husband comes home to-night, and I have left his house forever. You! you!" exclaimed she, extending her arms to his averted face; "O Constantine! you have robbed me of my peace! On your account I have flown from my home.—For mercy's sake, do not abandon me!"

"Lady Sara," cried he, looking wildly round him, I can not speak to you in this position! Rise, I implore you!"

"Only," returned she, "only say you will protect me! That I shall find a shelter here! Say this, and I will rise, and bless you for ever!"

Thaddeus knew not what to reply: Distressed by her imprudence, terror-struck at the violent lengths to which she seemed determined to carry her unhappy and guilty passion, he in vain sought to evade this direct demand; for Lady Sara, perceiving the reluctance and horror of his looks, sprang from her knees, and in a more resolute voice, exclaimed, "Then, Sir, you will not protect me? You scorn and desert a woman, whom you well know has long loved you? Whom, by your artful behaviour, you have reduced to this disgrace!"

The Count surprised and shocked at this accusation, with respectful gentleness, but resolution, denied the charge.

Lady Sara again melted into tears, and supporting her tottering frame against his shoulder, replied in a stifled voice, "I know it well. I have nothing to blame for my wretched state, but my own weakness. Pardon, dear Constantine, the dictates of my madness! O! I would gladly owe such misery to any other source than myself!"

"Then, dear Lady Sara," rejoined Thaddeus, gaining courage from the mildness of her manner, "let me implore you to return to your own house."

"Don't ask me," cried she, grasping his hand;

"O Constantine! if you knew what it was to receive with smiles of affection, a creature that you loathe! you would shrink with disgust from what you require. I hate Captain Roos. Can I open my arms to meet him, when my heart excludes him forever? Can I welcome him home, when I wish him in his grave?"

The Count extricated his hand from her grasp. Her ladyship perceived the repugnance which dictated this action; and clasping her hands together, ejaculated, "Unhappy woman that I am! to hate, where I am loved! to love, where I am hated!—Kill me, Constantine!" cried she, turning suddenly towards him, and sinking down on a chair, "but do not give me such another look as that!"

"Dear lady Sara," replied he, seating himself by her side, "what would you have me do? You see that I have no proper means of protecting you. I have no mother, no sisters, no friends to receive you. You see that I am a poor man. Besides your character——"

"Talk not of my character!" cried she, "I will have none that does not depend on you!—Cruel Constantine! you will not understand me. I want no riches, no friends, but yourself. Give me your arms," added she, throwing herself in an agony on his bosom; "and beggary would be paradise!"

Thaddeus felt a dimness spread over his eyes. So much loveliness, such love, such disinterestedness, for a moment obliterated every other impression on his heart; but recovering himself in an instant, he tore himself from her clinging arms, and staggering back a few paces, held her off with his hand, and in a voice of distraction, exclaimed, "Leave me, for pity's sake!"

"No, dearest Constantine," cried she, aware of her advantage, and again casting herself at his feet, "Never, never will I leave this spot, till you consent that your home shall be my home! That I shall serve you for ever!"

"All-powerful Heaven!" exclaimed Thaddeus, in an agony.

Lady Sara redoubled her tears and prayers.

"Seducing, dangerous woman!" cried he, looking at her with wild horror, "What is it you demand? Would you tear me from all that renders life bearable? Would you take from me a blameless conscience, and drive me to end my miserable days by a deed of desperation?"

Despair was on every feature of his countenance, as he uttered the last words, and flew from her, into the apartment, where the General lay asleep. Lady Sara, little expecting to see any one but the man she loved, rushed in after him, and was again pressing to throw her imploring arms about her determined victim, when her eyes were suddenly arrested by a livid, and she thought, dead face of a person lying on the bed. Fixed to the spot, she stood for a moment, then putting her spread hand on her forehead, she uttered a faint cry, and fell heart-struck and senseless on the floor.

Thaddeus having instant conviction of her mistake, eagerly seized the moment of her insensibility to convey her home. He hastily went to the top of the stairs, called to Nanny to run for a coach, and then returning to the extended figure of Lady Sara, lifted her in his arms, and carried her back to the room they had left.

By the help of hartshorn and water, he restored her to a sense of existence. She slowly opened her eyes: then raising her head, looked round her with a terrified air, when her eye falling on the still open door of the General's room, she caught Thaddeus by the arm, and said in a trembling voice, "Oh, take me from hence!"

Whilst she yet spoke, a coach stopped at the door. The Count rose, and attempted to support her agitated frame against his shoulders but she trembled to such a degree, that he was obliged to throw his arm about her waist, and almost carry her down stairs.

When he had placed her ladyship in the carriage, she retained his hand, and said in a faint tone; "You surely will not leave me?"

Thaddeus returned no other answer, than desiring Nanny to sit by the General till she saw him again; and stepping into the coach, Lady Sara immediately snatched his hand, and bathed it with her tears.

"Where are you going to take me?"

"You shall again, dear lady Sara," replied he, "return to a guiltless and peaceful home."

"I cannot meet my husband;" cried she, wringing her hands, "he will see all my premeditated guilt in my countenance. Oh! Constantine, have pity on me! Miserable creature that I am!" added she, redoubling her grief, "it is dreadful to live with him! Take me not home, I intreat you!"

The Count took her clapsed hands in his.

"Reflect for a moment my dear Lady Sara. I believe, if you love me, that it was in consequence of virtues, which you thought I possessed?"

"Indeed you do me justice!" cried she.

He continued.

"Think then should I yield to the influence of your beauty, and plunge you into a situation like that——" and he pointed to a group of unhappy women assembled at the corner of Pall-Mall. Lady Sara drew back with a thrill of horror; "Think where would be, not only your innocence, but its price? I, being no longer worthy of your esteem, you would hate me; you would hate yourself; and we should continue together, two guilty creatures, abhorring each other."

Lady Sara drowned in tears, did not articulate any sounds but deep sighs, till the coach stopped in St. James's Place.

"Go in with me," were all the words which she could utter, as, pulling her veil over her face, she gave him her hand to assist her down the step.

"Is Captain Roos arrived?" asked Thaddeus of a servant, who, to his great joy, returned a reply in the negative. During his ride, he had alarmed himself, by anticipating the disagreeable suspicions which might arise in the mind of the husband, should he see his wife in her present strange and distracted state.

When Thaddeus had seated Lady Sara in her drawing room, he prepared to take a respectful leave; but her ladyship getting up, laid one hand on his arm, whilst with the other she covered her convulsed features, and said, "Constantine, before you go; before we part, perhaps eternally; Oh! tell me that you do not hate me! That you do not hate me!" repeated she in a firmer tone. "I know too well how deeply I am despised."

"Cease my dearest madam," returned he, tenderly replacing her on the sofa, "cease these vehement expressions. Shame does not depend on possessing passions, but on yielding to them. You have conquered, Lady Sara; and in future, I shall respect and love you as a dear friend. Whoever holds the first place in my heart, you shall always retain the second."

"Noble! generous Constantine!" cried she, straining his hand to her lips, and bathing it with her tears; "I can require no more. May heaven bless you wherever you go!"

Thaddeus dropped upon his knee; imprinted on both her hands a compassionate and fervent kiss; and, rising hastily, quitted the room without a word.

CHAPTER XXIII.

'HE dream-like consternation which enveloped the Count's lties, since the preceding scene, was dissipated next morn-by the appearance of Dr. Cavendish. When he saw the eral, he declared it to be his opinion, that in consequence is long and tranquil slumbers, he should suppose some urable crisis to be near; probably, "the recovery of his llects. Such phenomena, often, in these cases happen immely before death."
Heaven grant it!" ejaculated the Count; "to hear his rable voice again acknowledge, that I have acted by him, ecame the grandson of his friend, would be a comfort
e."
But, Sir," said the kind physician, touching his burning
, "you must not forget the cares which are due to your life. If you wish well to the General during the few he may have to live, you are indispensably obliged to rve your own strength. I have an hour of leisure," cond he, pulling out his watch, "I will remain here till you taken two or three walks round the park. It is abso-r necessary; in this instance, I must take the privilege of lship, and insist on obedience."
addeus seeing that the benevolence of the exellent ndish was resolute, took his hat, and with harrassed
s, walked down the lane to Charing-cross.
entering Spring garden gate, to his extreme surprise, the bjects which met his sight, were Miss Euphemia Dundas, Miss Beaufort.
phemia accosted him immediately with ten thousand ins respecting his friend, besides congratulations on his ood looks.
addeus bowed; then smiling faintly, turned to the blushlary, who conscious of the recent conversation which had d between herself and Lady Tinemouth trembled so , that fearing to excite the suspicion of Miss E. Dundas ch tremor, she withdrew her arm, and walked forward, her feet tottering at every step.
thought, Miss Beaufort," said he, addressing himself to that Lady Tinemouth was to have had the happiness of ompany to Harwold park?"
es," returned she, fearfully raising her eyes to his face;
ectic glow of which conveyed different sensations to her breast, from those that Euphemia had expressed; "but to my considerable alarm and disappointment, the morning after I had written to fix my departure with her ladyship, my aunt's foot caught in the iron of the stair carpet, as she was coming down stairs, and throwing her from the top to the bottom, broke her leg. I could not quit her a moment during her first agonies; and the surgeons expressing their fears that a fever might ensue, I was obliged altogether to decline my attendance on the Countess!"

"And how is Miss Dorothy Somerset?" inquired Thaddeus, truly concerned at the accident.

"She is better, though confined to her bed;" replied Euphemia, speaking before her companion could open her lips; "and indeed poor Mary and myself have been such close nurses, that my mother insisted on our walking out to-day."

"And Lady Tinemouth;" returned Thaddeus, again addressing Mary, "of course she went alone."

"Alas, yes!" replied Mary, "Miss Egerton was forced to join her family in Leicestershire."

"I believe," cried Euphemia, sighing, "that Miss Egerton is going to be married immediately. It has been a long attachment. Happy girl! I have heard Captain Roos, whose Lieutenant he was, say that he is the finest young man in the Navy. Did you ever see Mr. Montressor?" added she, turning her pretty eyes on the Count.

"I never had the honor."

"Bless me! that is odd, considering your intimacy with Miss Egerton. I assure you he is very charming."

Thaddeus neither heard this nor a great deal more of the same trifling chit chat which was slipping from the tongue of Miss Euphemia; so intently were his eyes (sent by his heart) searching the downcast but expressive countenance of Miss Beaufort. Her soul was full, and the fluctuations of her colour with the embarrassment of her step, interested and affected him.

"Then you do not leave town for some time, Miss Beaufort?" inquired he, "I may yet anticipate the honour of seeing——" he hesitated a moment, then added in a depressed tone—"your aunt, when I next wait on the Miss Dundasses."

"Our stay entirely depends on her health;" returned she, striving to rally herself; and I am sure she will be equally happy to see you better; for I am sorry to say, that I cannot agree with Euphemia, in thinking that you look well."

"Merely a slight fever," replied he; "the effect of an anxiety and watching, which I fear will too soon cease, in the death of their cause. I came out now for a little air only, whilst the physician remains with my friend."

"Poor old gentleman!" sighed Mary, "how venerable was his appearance that morning in which we saw him in the Park! what a benign countenance!"

"His countenance," replied Thaddeus, his eyes turning mournfully towards the lovely speaker, "is the emblem of his character. He was the most amiable of men."

"And you are likely to lose so interesting a friend? Dear Mr. Constantine, how I pity you!" As Euphemia uttered these words, she put the corner of her glove to her eye.

The Count looked at her, and perceiving that her commiseration was affectation, he turned to Miss Beaufort, who was walking pensively by his side, and made further inquiries respecting Miss Dorothy. Solicitous to get back to St. Martin's Lane, he was preparing to quit them, when Mary, as with a full heart she curtsied her adieu, at last, in a hurrying and confused manner, said, "Pray, Mr. Constantine take care of yourself. You have other friends besides the one you are going to lose. I know Lady Tinemouth, I know my aunt ——" she stopped short, and covered with blushes, stood panting for another word to close the sentence; when Thaddeus forgetting the presence of Euphemia, with delightful precipitancy caught hold of the hand, which, in the energy of speaking, was a little extended towards him, and pressing it with fervour, relinquished it immediately: overcome by confusion at the presumption of the action, he bowed with agitation to both ladies, and hastened through the Priory passage, into St. James's Street.

"Miss Beaufort!" cried Euphemia, reddening with vexation, and returning her perfumed handkerchief to her pocket; "I did not understand that you and Mr. Constantine were on such intimate terms!"

"What do you mean Euphemia?"

"That you have betrayed the confidence which I reposed in you;" cried the angry beauty, wiping away the really starting tears with her white lace cloak; "I told you that the elegant Constantine was the lord of my heart, and you have seduced him from me! Till you came, he was so respectful, so tender, so devoted!—But I am rightly used! I ought to have carried my secret to the grave."

In vain Miss Beaufort protested; in vain she declared herself ignorant of possessing any power over even one wish of Constantine. Euphemia thought it monstrous pretty to be the injured friend, and forsaken mistress; and all along the Park, and up Constitution Hill, until they arrived at Lady Dundas's carriage, which was waiting opposite Devonshire Wall, she affected to weep. When seated, she continued her invectives; she called Miss Beaufort ungenerous, perfidious traitor to friendship; and every romantic and disloyal name which her inflamed fancy could devise, till the sight of Harley-street checked her transports, and relieved Miss Beaufort from a load of impertinence and abuse.

During this short interview, Thaddeus received an impulse to his feelings, which hurried them forward with an impetuous rapidity, that neither time nor succeeding sorrows could stop or stem.

Mary's heavenly beaming eyes seemed to have encircled his head with love's brightest lustre.—The command, "preserve yourself for others besides your dying friend," yet throbbed at his heart; with ten thousand rapturous visions dancing before his sight, he felt treading in air, till the humble door of his melancholy home presenting itself, at once wrecked the illusion, and offered sad reality, in the person of his emaciated friend.

On the count's entrance into the sick chamber, Dr. Cavendish gave him a few directions to pursue, when the General should awake from a sleep in which he had been sunk since the preceding night; and Thaddeus with a heart still more depressed, from the late unusual exaltation of his feelings, sat down on the bed for the remainder of the day.

At five in the afternoon, General Butzou awoke; seeing the Count he stretched out his withered hand, and, as the doctor had predicted, accosted him rationally.

"Come, dear Sobieski! Come nearer my dear master!"

Thaddeus rose and throwing himself on his knees, took the offered hand with apparent composure: it was a hard struggle to restrain the emotions which were roused by this awful contemplation:—the return of reason to the soul, on the instant she was summoned into the presence of her Maker!

"My kind, my beloved lord!" added Butzou, "to me you have indeed performed a Christian's part, you have clothed, sheltered, and preserved me in your bosom. Blessed son of my most honoured master!"

The good old man put the hand of Thaddeus to his lips. Thaddeus could not speak.

"I am going, dear Sobieski," continued the General, in a lower voice, "where I shall meet your noble grandfather, your mother, and my brave countrymen; and if heaven grants me power, I will tell them by whose labour I have lived, on whose breast I have expired."

Thaddeus could no longer retain his tears.

"Dear, dear General!" exclaimed he, grasping his hand: "my grandfather, my mother, my country! I lose them again in thee!—Oh! would the same summons take me hence!"

"Hush!" returned the dying man, "Heaven reserves you my honoured lord, for wise purposes. Youth and health are the marks of commission: you possess them, with virtues that will bear you through the contest. I have done; and my merciful judge has evinced his pardon of my errors, by sparing me in my old age, and leading me to die with you."

Thaddeus pressed his friend's hand to his streaming eyes and promised to be resigned. Butzou smiled upon him his satisfaction; then closing his eyelids, he composed himself to a rest that was neither sleep nor stupor, but a balmy serenity, which seemed to be tempering his late recovered soul, for its immediate entrance on a world of eternal peace.

At nine o'clock, his breath became broken with quick sighs. The Count's heart trembled, and he drew closer to the pillow. Butzou felt him, and opening his eyes languidly, hardly articulated, (though not a sound escaped the ear of his friend,) 'Raise my head."

Thaddeus put his arm under his neck and lifting him up, reclined him against his bosom. Butzou squeezed his hands, and looking gratefully in his face, said, "The arms of a soldier should be a soldier's bed. I am content."

He lay for a moment on the breast of the almost fainting Thaddeus; then suddenly quitting his grasp, he cried, "I lose you, Sobieski."

"I am here exclaimed the Count, catching his motionless hand. The dying General murmured a few words of blessing; and turning his face inwards, breathed his last sigh on the heart of his last friend.

For a minute, Sobieski remained incapable of thought or action. When he recovered recollection, he withdrew from his melancholy station, and laying the venerable remains of the General on the bed, did not trust his rallied faculties with a second trial, but hastening down stairs, was met by Mrs. Robson.

"My dear madam," said he, "all is over with my poor friend. Will you do me the everlasting kindness to perform those duties to his sacred relics, which I cannot?"

Mrs. Robson, with tears, and expressions of gratitude for his goodness, when she was in a similar distress, sent to request the assistance of the charitable neighbour who had succoured her in the case of her lamented little William; and together they arranged and ordered every thing that was requisite.

Thaddeus would not allow any one to watch by his friend's coffin besides himself. The meditations of this solitary night presented to his sound and feeling mind every argument, rather to induce rejoicing than regret, that the eventful life of the brave Butzou had terminated.

"Yes, illustrious old man!" cried he, gazing on his marble features, "If valour and virtue be the true sources of nobility, thou surely wert noble! inestimable defender of Stanislaus and thy country! thou hast run a long and bright career; and though thou art fated to rest in the humble grave of poverty, it will be embalmed by the tears of heaven: it will be engraven on my heart."

Thaddeus did not weep whilst he spoke. Nor did he weep when he beheld the mould of St. Martin's Church-yard close from his view, the last dwelling of his friend. It began to rain. Doctor Cavendish, putting his arm through the Count's tried to pull him away; but he lingered a moment? and, looking on the dust, as the sexton piled it up, "Wretched Poland!" sighed he, "how far from thee, lies one of thy brave sons!"

Doctor Cavendish regarded him with pity and admiration; but he vainly attempted to persuade him to return with him to dinner. Thaddeus refused the kind invitation; alleging with a faint smile, that under every misfortune he found his best comforter to be solitude.

Doctor Cavendish, respecting the resignation and manliness of this answer, urged him no further; but expressed his regret that they could not meet again till the end of the week, he being obliged to hurry down to Stamford next day, on a medical consultation of considerable moment; and shaking hands with his thoughtful friend, at the door of Mrs. Robson, they parted.

CHAPTER XXIV.

' morning, when the Count Sobieski unfolded the packets of papers which were put into his hands by anny, who brought his breakfast, he laid them, one e other, on the table and sighing heavily, said to him-Now comes the bitterness of poverty! Heaven only ›y what means I shall defray these terrific charges."
nere personal privations induced by his fallen fortunes, few uneasy sensations in the mind of Thaddeus. As derived no peculiar gratifications from the enjoyment gnificent house, splendid table, and numerous atten-he had felt equal content in the field, where he was rced to sleep on the bare ground and snatch his hasty uncertain intervals. Watching, rough fare, and other ›s, were dust in the path of honour; he had dashed them with light and buoyant spirits: and repined as the actual wants of his forlorn state in exile; till ed by friendship to contract demands that he could not ıe was plunged at once into the full horrors of poverty
t.
›oked at the amount of the bills. The apothecary's
:een pounds: the funeral twenty more. Thaddeus ›ale. The value of all he possessed would not produce of the sum; besides he owed five guineas to his good y for numerous little comforts appropriated to his l friend.
ıatever be the consequence," cried he, "that excellent shall not suffer by her humanity! If I have to part : last memorial of those who were so dear, she shall be ad scarcely ceased speaking, when Nanny re-entered m with a saddened countenance, and told him that the ary's young man, and the undertaker, were both below, for answers to their letters. The Count, reddening sgust at the unfeeling avidity of these men, desired to say, that he could not see either of them to-day, ıld send to their houses to-morrow.

nsequence of this promise, the men made their bows to obson, (who too well guessed the reason of this mes-ınd took their leaves.
ın Thaddeus put the pictures of his mother and the e, with other trinkets, into his pocket, he could not forbear feeling something like indignation against the thoughtle meanness of the Miss Dundasses; who, since his entrance in their house, had never offered any further liquidation of th large sum which they now stood indebted to him, than th trifling note which had been transmitted prior to his atte dance, through the hands of Lady Tinemouth.

Whilst his necessities reproached them for this illiberal co duct, his proud heart recoiled at making a request to the charity; for he gathered from the haughty demeanor of Mi Diana, that what he was entitled to demand, would be give not as a just remuneration for labour received, but as alms of humanity to an indigent emigrant.

"I would rather perish," cried he, putting on his hat, "th ask that woman for a shilling."

When the Count laid his treasure on the table of the co siderate pawn-broker, he desired to have the value of th settings, and the pictures put into leather cases. Mr. Burn having examined the gold of the miniatures, with the oth trinkets, declared upon the word of an honest man, that h could not give more than fifteen pounds.

With difficulty Thaddeus stifled as torturing a sigh as ev distended his breast, whilst he said,

"I will take it. I only implore you to be careful of th things! trifling as they are, circumstances with which the were connected, render them valuable to me."

"You may depend on me, Sir," replied the pawn-broke presenting him the notes and acknowledgment.

When Thaddeus took them, Mr. Burnet's eye was caugh by the ring which he wore on his finger.

"That ring seems curious! If you won't consider it impe tinent, may I ask to look at it?"

The Count immediately took it off, and forcing a smil replied, "I suppose it is of little intrinsic value. The settin is antique, but the painting is fine."

Burnet breathed on the diamonds. "If you were to sell it," returned he, "I don't think it would fetch more than thre guineas. The diamonds are damaged, and the emeralds woul be of little use, being out of fashion here, as for the miniature it goes for nothing."

"Of course," said Thaddeus, putting it on again; "but never shall part with it." Whilst he drew on his glove, Mr Burnet asked him, whether the head were not intended for th king of Poland.

The Count, surprised, answered in the affirmative,

"I thought so," answered the man; "it is very like two or three prints which I had in my shop of that king. Indeed I believe I have them somewhere now: these matters are but a nine days wonder, and the sale is over."

His auditor did not clearly comprehend him, and he told him so.

"I meant nothing," continued he, "to the disparagement of the king of Poland: or of any other great personage, who is much the subject of conversation. I only intended to say, that every thing has its fashion. The ruin of Poland was the fashionable topic for a month after it happened; and now nobody minds it; it is extinct; it is forgotten."

Thaddeus who felt he had all its miseries written in his bosom, with a clouded brow, bowed to the remarks of Mr. Burnet, and in silence quitted the shop.

Mrs. Robson was standing with a man in the passage, when he arrived at home. Thaddeus saw that the good woman had been weeping; and, from the angry countenance of her companion, easily divined the occasion of the debate. He asked Nanny, whom he found in the kitchen, what was the matter.

"Nothing, sir," said she, "but Mr. White, the baker; he has been twice this week to my grandmother for four pounds which she owes him, and I know she cannot pay him yet."

"Call her in," returned the Count, glad that he at least possessed the power, by discharging his debt to her, to relieve so much worth from embarrassment.

Whilst Mrs. Robson obeyed the summons of her beloved lodger, he distinctly heard the incorrigible baker cry after her, "Remember, mistress I will not leave this spot till I am paid."

"Here, my good Mrs. Robson," said Thaddeus, smiling kindly, and putting five guineas into her head, "here is the money that you have expended for my poor friend! my gratitude will ever be your due."

Mrs. Robson received the gold with a low curtesy, and hastened out of the room, elated with honest triumph, at the opportunity of so immediately satisfying the rapacity of her creditor.

Thaddeus having entered his own room, laid the remainder of his money on the bills of the two claimants. It was unequal to the demands of either; yet, in some measure to be just to both he determined on dividing it between them; and to promise the liquidation of the rest by degrees.

Surely he might hope that, even should the Miss Dundasses entirely forget his claims on them, his labour could, in the course of time, make drawings sufficient to recover the residue of the debt! But he was not permitted to put this calculation to the trial.

When he called on the apothecary, and offered him five guineas, the man refused it with insolence, insisting on the whole. Unused to the language of compulsion and vulgarity, the Count quitted the shop, telling the man he was at liberty to act as he thought fit; and with no very serene countenance he entered the undertaker's wharehouse. This man was civil: to him Thaddeus gave the sum, half of which the apothecary had rejected with so much derision. The politeness of the undertaker a little calmed the irritated temper of the Count; who returned home, pondering on the vile nature of that part of mankind, which can, with indifference, heap insult on distress.

Judging men by his own disposition, he had seldom given credence to the possibility of such conduct. He had been told of dastardly spirits; but never having seen them, and possessing no prototype within his own breast, of what he heard, the repeated relation passed over his mind without leaving an impression. He had sprung into the world, filled with animating hopes of virtues and renown. He was virtuous; he became powerful, great, and renowned. Creation seemed paradise to his eyes; it was the task of adversity to teach him a different lesson of mankind. Not less virtuous, not less great, his fortunes fell, he became poor; the perfidy, the hard-heartedness of man, made and kept him friendless. When he wanted succour and consolation, he found the world peopled by a race too mean, even to bear the stamp of the devil.

Whilst Sobieski was employed next morning at his drawing, Mrs. Robson sent Nanny to say, that there were two strange looking men below, who wanted to speak with him. Not doubting their being messengers from the apothecary, he desired that they might come up stairs. When they entered his room, the Count, with the politeness spontaneous to his ever wakeful benevolence, rose. One of the men stepped forward, and laying a slip of paper on the table, said, "I arrest you, sir, at the suit of Mr. Jackson the apothecary."

Thaddeus felt his cheek flush; but suppressing every indignant emotion, he calmly asked the men where they were going to take him?

"If you like," replied one of them, "you may be well enough lodged. I never heard a word against Clement's in Wych-street."

"Is that a prison?" inquired Thaddeus.

"No, not exactly that sir;" answered the other man, laughing; "You seem to know little of the matter, which, for a Frenchman, is odd enough! But mayhap you have never a lock-up house there? Howsomever, if you pay well, Mr. Clements will give you lodgings as long as you like. It is only poor rogues who are obligated to go to Newgate; such gemmen as you can live ginteelly in Wych-street as at their own houses."

There was such an air of derision about this fellow, as he spoke and glanced round the room, that Thaddeus, sternly contracting his brows, deigned to take no further notice of him; but turning to his more civil companion, said:

"Has this person informed me rightly? Am I going to a prison, or am I not? If I do not possess money to pay Mr. Jackson, I can have none to spend elsewhere."

"Then you must go to Newgate;" answered the man, in as surly a tone as his comrade's had been insolent.

"I'll run for a coach, Wilson," cried the other opening the room door.

"I will not pay for one," said Thaddeus, at once comprehending the sort of wretches into whose custody he had fallen; "follow me down stairs, I shall walk."

Mrs. Robson was in her shop as he passed to the street. She called out, "You will come home to dinner, Sir?"

"No," replied he, "but you shall hear from me before night."

The men, winking at each other, sullenly pursued his steps down the lane. In the Strand, Thaddeus asked which way he was to proceed.

"Straight on," cried one of them, "most folks find the road to jail easy enough."

Involved in thought, the Count walked forward, unmindful of the stare which the well-known occupation of his attendants attracted towards him. When he arrived at Somerset-house, one of the men stepped up to him, and said, "We are now nearly opposite Wych-street. You had better take your mind again, and go there instead of Newgate; I don't much think you will like the debtor's-hole."

Thaddeus coldly thanked him, and repeated his determination to be led to Newgate. But when he beheld the immense walls, within which he believed he should be immured for life, his feet seemed rooted to the ground: and when the massy gates were opened and closed upon him, he felt as if suddenly deprived of the vital spring of existence. A mist spread over his eyes, his soul shuddered, and with difficulty he followed the men into the place where his commitment was to be ratified. Here, all the proud feelings of his nature again rallied themselves round his heart.

The brutal questions of the people in office, re-echoed by the taunts from the wretches who had brought him to the prison, were of a complexion so much beneath his answering, that he stood perfectly silent during the business; and when dismissed, without evincing any signs of discomposure, followed the turnkey to his cell.

One deal chair, a table, and a miserable bed, were all the furniture it contained. The floor was paved with flags; and the sides of the apartment daubed with discoloured plaster, part of which having been pealed off by the damp, exposed to view large spaces of the naked stones.

Before the turnkey withdrew, he asked Thaddeus whether he wanted any thing?

"Only a pen, ink and paper."

The man held out his hand.

"I have no money," replied Sobieski.

"Then you get nothing here," answered the fellow, pulling the door after him.

Thaddeus threw himself on the chair, and in the bitterness of the moment, exclaimed, "Can these scoundrels be Christians? Can they be men?" He cast his eyes around him with the wildness of despair; "All powerful Heaven! Can it be possible, that for a few guineas I am to be confined in this place during life? In these narrow bounds am I to waste my youth, my existence? Even so; I cannot, I will not, degrade the spirit of Poland, by imploring assistance from a native of a land, in which avarice has choaked the feelings of humanity.

By the next morning, the first paroxysms of indignation having subsided, Thaddeus entertained a cooler and more reasonable opinion of his situation.

He considered that, though he was a prisoner, it was in consequence of debts incurred in behalf of a friend, whose latter hours were rendered less wretched by such means. Feeling that, notwithstanding 'all that man could do unto him,' he had brought an approving conscience to brighten the glooms of a dungeon, he resumed his wonted serenity, and continued

itance the impertinent freedom of his gaolers, by a stern ty which extorted civility and commanded respect.

CHAPTER XXV.

VERAL days elapsed, without the inhabitants of Harley-hearing any tidings of Thaddeus.
ss Dundas never bestowed a thought on his absence, ex-when descanting on her favourite subject, the insolence of ident people, she alledged his daring to withdraw himself in instance. Miss Euphemia uttered all her complaints iss Beaufort; whom she accused of not being satisfied seducing the affections of Mr. Constantine, but she must pirit him away, lest by remorse, he should be induced to r his former devotion at the shrine of her tried constancy.
ry found these secret conferences very frequent and teasing. She neither believed the Count's past devoirs phemia, nor his present allegiance to herself. With un-feelings, she watched the slow decline of every succeed-ay, hoping that each knock at the door would either t himself or an apology for his absence.
rain her reason urged the weakness and folly of giving o the influence of a passion as violent as it was unfore-
"It is not his personal graces;" murmured she, whilst wy eyes remained rivetted on the floor; "it is not them; ave not accomplished this effect on me! No: matchless is; though his countenance expresses godlike beauty, illumed by the rare splendour of genius: yet, my heart
ne, I would rather see all that perfection demolished, ose one beam of these bright charities which first attract-esteem. Yes, Constantine!" cried she, rising in agita-I could adore thy virtues were they even in the bosom ormity. It is them that I love; it is them, that are f! It is thy noble, godlike soul, that so entirely fills my and will forever!"
recalled the hours, which in his society had glided so r by, to pass in review before her. They came, and her redoubled. Neither his words nor his looks had been to her, than to Miss Egerton or Lady Sara Roos.
membered his wild action in the Park; it had transport-
r at the moment; it even now made her heart throb:

but she ceased to believe it intended more than an animated expression of gratitude.

An adverse feeling seemed to have taken possession of her breast. In proportion to the vehemence of Miss Euphemia's reproaches (who insisted on the passion of Thaddeus) she the more doubted the evidence of those delightful emotions which had rushed over her soul, when she found her hand so fervently pressed in his.

Euphemia never made a secret of the tendresse she professed; and Miss Beaufort having been taught by her own heart, to read distinctly the eyes of lady Sara, the result of her observations, had long acted as a caustic on her peace; it robbed her cheeks of their bloom, and compelled her to number the lingering minutes of the night with sighs. But her deep and modest flame assumed no violence; retreating far from sight, it burnt the more intensely.

Instead of over-valuing the fine person of Thaddeus, the encomiums which it extracted from even the lips of prejudice occasioned one source of her pain. She could not bear to think it probable, that the man whom she believed and knew to be gifted with every attribute of goodness and heroism, might one day be induced to sacrifice the rich treasure of his mind, to a creature, who would select him from the rest, merely on account of his personal superiority.

Such was the train of Mary's meditations, when covering her face with her handkerchief, she exclaimed in a hurried and purturbed voice, "Ah! Why did I leave my quiet home, to expose myself to the vicissitudes of society? sequestered from the world, neither its pageants nor its mortifications could have reached me there. I have seen thee, matchless Constantine! Like a bright star thou hast passed before my eyes! like a being of superior order! And I never can debase my nature to love another. Thy image shall follow me into solitude; shall consecrate my soul to the practice of every virtue! I will emulate thy excellence, when, perhaps, thou hast forgotten that I exist."

The fit of despondency, which threatened to succeed this last abrupt reflection, was interrupted by the sudden entrance of Euphemia. Miss Beaufort hastily rose, and drew her ringlets over her eyes.

"O, Mary!" cried the little beauty, holding up her pretty hands, "What do you think has happened!"

"What?" demanded she in alarm, and hastening towards the door, "any thing to my aunt?"

"No, no:" answered Euphemia, catching her by the arm; "but could my injured heart feel satisfaction in revenge, I should now be happy. Punishment has overtaken the faithless Constantine."

Mary looked aghast; and, grasping the back of a chair to prevent her from falling, breathless inquired what she meant.

"Oh! He is sent to prison!" cried Euphemia, not regarding the real agitation of her auditor (so entirely was she occupied in appearing overwhelmed in distress) and wringing her hands, she continued in a wimpering voice; "that frightful wretch, Mr. Lascelles, is just come to dinner. You cannot think with what devilish glee he told me, that about a week ago, as he was driving out of town, he saw Mr. Constantine with two bailiffs hehind him, walking down Fleet-street! And, besides, I verily believe, he said he had irons on."

"Father of Heavens!" ejaculated Mary with a cry of terror, at this ad libitum addition of Euphemia's, "What can he have done?"

"Bless my soul, Mary!" returned Euphemia, staring at her, as she sat pale and trembling in a chair; "Why, what frightens you so! Does not every body run in debt without minding it!"

Miss Beaufort shook her head; and looking distractedly about her, put her hand to her forehead. Euphemia, now quite alarmed, forced her to drink some water; and, while the horror-struck Mary, with ten thousand vague and hideous fancies racking her heart, leaned against the wall, the little beauty, unconscious what part of her narrative occasioned these emotions, thought to obliterate what she had said, by saying more; and, determining not to be outdone in 'tender wo,' drew forth her handkerchief, and putting it to her eyes, resumed in a piteous tone;

"I am sure I shall hate Lascelles all my life, because he did not stop the men, and inquire what jail they were taking him to! you know, Mary, you and I might have visited him. It would have been delightful to have consoled his sad hours! We might have planned his escape."

"In irons!" ejaculated Mary, raising her tearless eye to heaven.

Euphemia coloured at the agonized manner in which these words were reiterated, and rather confusedly replied, "Not absolutely in irons. You know that is a metaphorical term for captivity."

"Then he was not in irons?" cried Miss Beaufort, seizing her hand eagerly, "Tell me for heaven's sake, tell me he was not in irons?"

"Why then," returned Euphemia, half angry at being obliged to contradict herself; "if you are such a fool, that you cannot understand poetical language, I must tell you he was not."

Mary heard no more, but even at the momont when a bright glow overspread her countenance, fell senseless back into the chair.

Euphemia flew immediately to the top of the stairs shrieking violently, stood wringing her hands, till Diana and Lady Dundas, followed by several gentlemen, hastened out of the saloon, and demanded what was the matter? As soon as Euphemia had pointed to Mary's dressing-room door, she staggered, and sinking into the arms of Lord Elsmere, fell into the most outrageous hysterics. The Marquis, who had just dropt in, on his return from St. James's, became so possessed with dread of the agitated lady's tearing his point-laced ruffles, that in almost as trembling a state as herself, he gladly shuffled her into the hands of her maid; and scampering down stairs as if all bedlam were at his heels, sprung into his vis-a-vis, and drove off like lightning.

When Miss Beaufort opened her eyes, at the sight of such a crowd, she had nearly relapsed: but trying to repel her confusion, she rose and supporting herself on the arm of Miss Dorothy's maid, thanked the company for their attention, and desired to be assisted to her chamber.

Meanwhile, Euphemia, who had been carried down into the saloon, thought it time to raise her lily hand, and utter a few coherent words; the instant they were breathed, Miss Dundas and Mr. Lascelles, in one voice demanded what was the matter.

"Has not Mary told you?" returned her sister, languidly opening her eyes.

"No," answered Lascelles, rubbing his hands with delighted curiosity. "Come let us have it?"

Euphemia, pleased at this, and loving mystery with all her heart, waved her hand solemnly, and in an awful tone, replied: "Then it passes not my lips."

"What, Phemy!" cried he, "you want us to believe that you have seen a ghost? But you forget they don't walk at mid-day."

"Believe what you like," returned she, with an air of consequential contempt: "I am satisfied to keep the secret."

Miss Dundas burst into a provoking laugh; and calling her the most incorrigible little idiot she had ever seen, encouraged Lascelles to join in the ridicule. Determining to gratify his spleen, if he could not satisfy his curiosity, this witless coxcomb continued the whole day in Harley-street, for the mere pleasure of tormenting Euphemia. From the dinner hour until twelve at night, neither his drowsy fancy, nor wakeful malice, could find one other weapon of assualt, than the stale jokes attending mysterious chambers, lovers incognito; or the silly addition of two Cupid-struck sweeps, hopping down the chimney to pay their addresses to their fair friends. Diana talked of Jupiter with his thunder; and patting her sister under the chin, added, "I cannot doubt that Mary is the favored Semele; But my dear you have overacted your character! As confidant, a few tears were enough when your lady fainted." During these attacks, Euphemia reclined pompously on a sofa, and not deigning a reply, repelled them with much conceit and haughtiness.

Miss Beaufort remained above an hour alone in her chamber, before she ventured to go near her aunt. Hurt to the soul, that the idle folly of Euphemia should have aroused a terror which had completely unveiled to the eyes of that inconsiderate girl the empire which Thaddeus held over her fate, Mary, overwhelmed with shame, and arraigning her easy credulity, threw herself on the bed.

Horror-struck at hearing he was led along the streets in chains, she could have no other idea, but that hurried into the commission of some dreadful deed, he was become amenable to the laws, and might suffer an ignominious death. These thoughts, having rushed at once on her heart had deprived her of all self-command. In the conviction that he was a murderer, she felt, as if her life, her honour, her soul, were annihilated. And when in consequence of her agonies, Euphemia, confessed that she had in this last matter, told a falsehood, the tumult of her joy took refuge in insensibility.

Before Miss Beaufort quitted her room, various plans suggested themselves to relieve the unfortunate situation of Thaddeus. She found no hesitation in believing him poor; and perhaps rendered wretchedly so, by the burden of that sick friend whom she suspected might be some near relation. At any rate, she resolved that another sun should not pass over her head, and shine on him in a prison. Having determined to pay all his debts herself; she next thought of how she might manage the affair without betraying the hand from whence the assistance came. Had her aunt been well enough to leave the house, she could not have scrupled at unfolding to her the recent calamity of Mr. Constantine. But well aware that Miss Dorothy's maidenly nicety would be outraged at a young woman appearing the sole mover in such a business, she conceived herself obliged at present entirely to withhold her confidence, and decide on prosecuting the whole transaction alone.

In consequence of these meditations, her spirits became less discomposed; and, turning towards Miss Dorothy Somerset's apartments, she found the good old lady sipping her chocolate.

"What is this that I have just heard, my dear Mary? Williams tells me that you have been ill?" Miss Beaufort returned her aunt's gracious inquiry with an affectionate kiss; and, proceeding to inform her, that she had only been alarmed by an invention of Miss Euphemia's, she begged that the subject might drop, it being merely one out of the many schemes, which she believed that young lady had devised to give her torment.

"Ah!" replied Miss Dorothy, "I hope I shall be well enough to travel in the course of a few days! I can now walk with a stick; and, upon my word, I am heartily tired both of Lady Dundas and her daughters."

Mary expressed similar sentiments with these; but as the declaration passed her lips, a sigh almost buried the last word. Go when she would, she must leave Constantine behind; leave him, without an expectation of beholding him more; without a hope of penetrating that sensitive care, with which he had ever eluded any attempt to discover his birth or misfortunes. She sighed over this refinement of delicacy, and "loved him dearer for his mystery."

When the dawn broke next morning, it shone on Mary's yet unclosed eyes. Sleep could find no languid faculty in her head whilst her heart was agitated with plans for the relief of Thaddeus. The idea of visiting the coffee-house to which she knew the Miss Dundasses directed their letters and of asking questions about a young and handsome man, made her timidity shrink.

"But," exclaimed she, "I am not going on an errand that need cause a blush on the cheek of prudery itself. I am going to impart some alleviation to the sufferings of the noblest creature that ever walked the earth!"

Perhaps there are few persons, who being auditors of this speech would have decided quite so candidly on the superlative by which it was concluded. Mary herself was not wholly divested of doubt about the issue of her conduct; but conscious that her motive was pure, she descended to the breakfast-room with a quieter mind than countenance.

Never before having had an occasion to throw a false gloss on her actions, she scarcely looked up during breakfast. When the cloth was removed, she rose suddenly from her chair, and turning to Miss Dorothy, who sat at the other end of the parlour with her foot on a stool, she said, "good bye, aunt. I am going to make some particular calls, but I shall be back in a few hours." Luckily, no one observed her blushing face whilst she spoke, nor the manner, in which she shook hands with the old lady, and hurried out of the room.

Breathless with confusion, she could scarcely stand when she arrived in her own chamber; but feeling that no time could be lost, she tied on a muslin cloak, covered her head with a large summer bonnet, and put a long shawl with a veil into her pocket. She hesitated a moment at her chamber door; her eyes filled with tears, drawn from her heart by that keen spirit of truth which had ever been the guardian of her conduct. Looking up to heaven, she sunk down on her knees, and exclaimed with impetuosity, "Father of Mercy! it is thou only that knowest my heart! Direct me, I beseech thee! Let me not commit any thing unworthy of myself, or of the unhappy Constantine—for whom I would sacrifice my life, but not my duty to thee!"

Re-assured by the confidence which this simple act of devotion had inspired, she took her parasol and descended the stairs. The porter was alone in the hall. She inquired for her servant.

"He is not returned, madam."

Miss Beaufort, having forseen the necessity of getting rid of all attendants, had sent her footman on an errand as far as Cheapside.

"It is of no consequence," returned she to the porter, who was just going to propose one of Lady Dundasses men; "I cannot meet with any thing disagreeable at this time of day, so I shall walk alone."

The man opened the door, and Mary with a bounding heart, hastened down the street, across the square, and at the bottom of Orchard-street stepped into a hackney-coach, which she ordered to drive to Slaughter's coffee-house, St. Martin's lane.

She drew up the glasses! then taking the shawl and veil with trembling hands covered her graceful figure, hoping that the metamorphosis might make her pass very well for a servant maid. With difficulty she could individualize the many thoughts which agitated her anxious mind whilst the carriage rolled along; and when it drew up at the coffee-house, she involuntarily retreated back into the corner.

The coach door was opened.

"Will you alight, ma'am?"

"No, call a waiter."

A waiter immediately appeared; and Miss Beaufort, in a tolerably collected voice, inquired if Mr. Constantine lived there?

"No, ma'am."

A cold dew stood on Mary's forehead; but taking courage from a latent and last hope, she added, "I know that he has had letters directed to this place."

"Oh! I beg your pardon, ma'am;" returned the man, evidently recollecting himself; "That is true! I remember a person of that name has received letters from hence, but they were always fetched away by a little girl."

"And do you not know where he lives?"

"No, ma'am;" answered he, "yet some one else may: will inquire."

Miss Beaufort bowed her head in token of acknowledgment, and sat shivering with suspense, till he returned followed by another man.

"This person, ma'am," resumed he, "says he can tell you."

"Thank you, thank you!" cried Mary; then blushing at her eagerness, she stopped and drew back into the carriage.

"I cannot for certain;" said the man, "but I know the girl very well by sight, who comes for the letters; and I have often seen her standing at the door of a chandler's shop, a good way down the lane. I think it is No. 5, or 6. I sent a woman there, who came after the same gentleman, about a fortnight ago. I dare say he lives there."

Mary's expectations sunk again, when she found that she had nothing but a dare say to depend on; and, giving half a crown to each of her informers, she desired the coachman to drive as they would direct him.

Whilst the carriage drove down the lane, with a heart full of fears, she looked from side to side, almost believing that she would know by intuition the house which had contained Constantine. When the man checked his horses, and her eyes

n the little mean dwelling of Mrs. Robson, she smothered p sigh.
'an this be the house in which Constantine has lived!
comfortless!—And should it not," thought she, as the got off his box to inquire, "where shall I go for in-ıtion?"
ıe appearance of Mrs. Robson, and her immediate affirre to the question, "are these Mr. Constantine's lodgings?"
ıce dispelled this last anxiety. Encouraged by the erly expression of the good woman's manner, Mary ed leave to alight. Mrs. Robson readily offered her arm; with many apologies for the disordered state of the house, ıer up stairs, to the room which had been the Count's ary trembled violently; but seeing that every thing deed on self-command, with apparent tranquillity she ved the chair that was presented to her, and turning her from the books and drawings, which told so truly in ıe apartment she was, she desired Mrs. Robson, who cond standing, to be seated. The good woman obeyed;
some trepidation, Miss Beaufort asked where Mr. Conine was? Mrs. Robson coloured, and looking at her tioner for some time, as if doubting what to say, burst into ary's ready eyes felt much inclined to flow in concert:
subduing the strong emotions which shook her breast, she d "I do not come here out of an impertinent curiosity.
ve heard of the misfortunes of Mr. Constantine. I am known to his friends."
Dear lady?" cried the good woman, grasping at any pros-of succour to her benefactor: "If he has friends, who-they are, tell them he is the noblest, most humane gen-an in the world. Tell them he has saved me and mine ı the deepest want: and now he is sent to prison, because annot pay the cruel doctor that attended the poor dead eral."
What, is his friend dead!" ejaculated Mary, unable to rain the tears which now streamed over her face.
Yes," replied Mrs. Robson; "Poor old gentleman! he is l sure enough; and, Heaven knows, many has been the ıry hours that dear young man has watched by his pillow!
died in that room."
Mary's swimming eyes would not allow her to discern ects through the open door of that apartment within which the heart of Thaddeus had undergone such variety of misery. Feeling an irresistible wish to know whether the deceased were any relation of Constantine's, she paused a moment to compose the agitation that might have betrayed her, and then asked.

"I thought ma'am," replied Mrs. Robson, "that you said you knew his friends?"

"Only his English ones," returned Mary, a little confused at the suspicion this answer implied: "I had imagined that this old gentleman might have been his father, or an uncle, or——"

"O no," interrupted Mrs. Robson, sorrowfully, "he has neither father, mother, nor uncle, in the wide world. He once told me they were all dead, and that he saw them die. Alas! sweet soul! What a power of griefs he must have seen in his young life; but Heaven will favor him at last, for though he is in misfortune himself, he has been a blessing to the widow and the orphan."

"Do you know the amount of his debts?" asked Mary.

"Only thirty pounds," returned Mrs. Robson: "and for that, they took him out of this room a week ago; and hurried him away without letting me know a word of the matter. I believe to this hour, I should not have known where he was, if that brute, Mr. Jackson, had not come to demand all that Mr. Constantine had left in my care. But I would not let him have it! I told the man, if my lodger had filled my house with bags of gold, he should not touch a shilling; and then the ill-natured wretch abused me, and told me that Mr. Constantine was in Newgate."

"In Newgate!"

"Yes, madam, I immediately ran there, and found him more able to comfort me, than I was able to speak to him."

"Then be at rest, my good woman," returned Miss Beaufort, rising from her chair; "when you next hear of Mr. Constantine, he shall be at liberty. He has friends who will not sleep till he is out of prison."

"May heaven bless you and them, my dear lady!" cried Mrs. Robson, weeping with joy, "for they will release the most generous heart alive."

Mary cast a wishful look on the drawings which stood on a bureau; then withdrawing her eyes, with a deep sigh, she descended the stairs. At the street-door she took Mrs. Robson's hand, and not relinquishing it till she was seated in the coach, pressed it warmly, and leaving within it a purse of twenty guineas, ordered the man to return whence he came.

Now that the temerity of going herself to learn the particulars of Mr. Constantine's fate had been achieved, determined as she was not to close her eyes whilst the man whom she valued above her life, remained a prisoner and in sorrow, she thought it best to consult with Miss Dorothy, respecting the speediest means of compassing his emancipation.

In Oxford-road, she desired the man to proceed to Harley-street. She had alighted at Lady Dundas's door, paid the coach, and stepped into the hall, before she perceived that a travelling carriage, belonging to her guardian, had driven away to afford room for her humble equipage.

"Is Sir Robert Somerset come to town?" she hastily inquired of the porter.

"No, madam; but Mr. Somerset has just arrived."

The next moment Miss Beaufort was in the drawing room, and clasped within the arms of her cousin.

"Dear Mary!"—"Dear Pembroke!" were the first words which passed between these two affectionate friends.

Miss Dorothy, who doated on her nephew, taking his hand fondly, as he seated himself between her and his cousin, said in a congratulatory voice, "Mary, our dear boy has come to town purposely to take us down."

"Yes, indeed," rejoined he, "my father is moped to death for want of you both. You know that I am a sad run-about. Lord Arun and Mr. Loftus have been gone these ten days to his lordship's aunt's in Bedfordshire: and Sir Robert is so completely weary of solitude, that he has commanded me," bowing to the other ladies, "to run off with all the fair inhabitants of this house sooner than leave you behind."

"I shall be happy at another opportunity to visit Somerset Castle," returned Lady Dundas; "but I am constrained to spend this summer in Dumbartonshire: I have not yet seen the estate that my poor dear Sir Hector bought of the Duke of Dumfries."

Pembroke offered no attempt to shake this resolution. In the two or three morning calls which he had made with Sir Robert Somerset on the rich widow, he had seen sufficient to regard her arrogant vulgarity with disgust; and for her daughters, they were of too common a stamp, to occupy his mind any deeper than with a magic lantern impression of a tall woman with bold eyes, and the prettiest little blue eyed fairy he had ever beheld.

Miss Beaufort sunk again into abstraction. During the first month of Mary's acquaintance with Thaddeus, she had mentioned in her correspondence with Pembroke, having met with a very interesting and accomplished emigrant in the quality of a tutor at Lady Dundas's. But her cousin, in his replies, beginning to banter her on the plea of pity being allied to love, she gradually dropped all mention of his name as she too truly found, by what insensible degrees the union had taken place within her own breast. She remembered these particulars, whilst a new method of obtaining the desired end, suggested itself; and determining (however extraordinary her conduct might seem) to rest on the rectitude of her motives, she resolved that as a man must be the properest person to transact such business with propriety, she would engage Pembroke for her agent, without troubling Miss Dorothy about the affair.

So deeply was she absorbed in these reflections, that Somerset observing her vacant eye fixed on the opposite wall, took her hand with an arch smile and exclaimed.

"Mary! What is the matter? I hope Lady Dundas, you have not suffered any one to run away with her heart? You know that I am her cousin, and it is my unalienable right."

Lady Dundas replied, that young ladies best knew their own secrets.

"That may be, madam," rejoined he, "But I won't allow Miss Beaufort to know any thing that she does not transfer to me. Is not that true Mary?"

"Yes," whispered she, colouring; "and the sooner you afford me an opportunity to interest you in one, the more I shall feel obliged to you."

Pembroke pressed her hand in token of assent: and in a desultory conversation continuing for another half hour, Mary, who dreaded the wasting of one minute in a day, so momentous to her peace, sat uneasy, till her aunt proposed retiring to dress for dinner, and requested Pembroke to assist her up stairs.

When he returned to the drawing room, to his extreme satisfaction, he found all the party separated excepting Miss Beaufort, who was standing by one of the windows evidently lost in thought. He approached her, and taking her hand, led her back to the sofa she had quitted.

"Come my dear cousin," said he, in an affectionate voice, "how can I oblige you?"

Mary struggled with her confusion. Had she less loved

Thaddeus, she found she could with greater ease have related the interest which she took in his fate. She tried to speak distinctly, and she accomplished it; although her burning cheek and down-cast look, told to the fixed eye of Pembroke, what she vainly attempted to conceal.

"You can indeed oblige me! You must remember a Mr. Constantine! I once mentioned him to you in my letters."

"I do, Mary. You thought him amiable."

"He was the intimate friend of Lady Tinemouth," returned she, striving to look up, but the piercing expression which she met from the eyes of Somerset, beating hers down again, covered her face and neck with deeper blushes; she panted for breath.

"Dear Mary!" said Pembroke, pitying her embarrassment, whilst he dreaded that her gentle heart had indeed become the victim of some accomplished and insidious foreigner, "Rely on me, my beloved cousin; consider me as a brother. If you have entangled yourself—"

Miss Beaufort guessed what he would say; and interrupting him, added with a more assured air, "No, Pembroke, I have no entanglements. I am going to ask your friendly assistance in behalf of a brave and unfortunate Polander." Pembroke reddened, and she went on. "Mr. Constantine is a gentleman. Lady Tinemouth tells me, he has been a soldier, and that he lost all his possessions in the ruin of his country. Her ladyship introduced him here; I have seen him often, and I know him to be worthy the esteem of every honourable heart. He is now in prison, in Newgate, for a debt of thirty pounds, I ask you to go and release him. That is my request, my secret: and I confide in your discretion, that you will keep it even from him."

"Dear, generous, lovely Mary!" cried Pembroke, kissing her hand, "it is thus that you always act! Possessed of all the softness of thy sex, dearest girl," added he still more affectionately, "nature has not alloyed it with one particle of weakness."

Mary smiled and sighed; if to love tenderly, to be devoted, life and soul to one being, whom she considered as the most perfect work of creation, be weakness, Mary felt that she was the weakest of the weak; and with a languid despondence at her heart, was opening her lips to give some directions to her cousin, when the attention of both were arrested by a shrill noise of speakers talking above stairs. Before the cousins had time to make an observation, the disputants descended towards the drawing room with a violent clamour, and b ing open the door, presented the enraged figure of Lady das, followed by Diana, who with no less swollen counten was scolding vociferously, and dragging forward the we Euphemia.

"Gracious Heaven!" exclaimed Somerset, amazed extraordinary a scene, "What is the matter?"

Lady Dundas lifted up her clenched hands in a passior
"A jade! a hussey!" cried she, incapable of articul more.

Miss Dundas, still grasping the hands of her strugglin ter, broke out next, and turning furiously towards Mar claimed, "You see, madam, what disgrace your ridic conduct to that vagabond foreigner has brought on our fa
This bad girl has followed your example, and done w
she has fallen in love with him!"

Mary, pale and trembling at so rude an accusation, wa able to speak. Lost in wonder, and incensed at his co goodness having been the dupe of imposition, Pembroke silent while Lady Dundas took up the subject.

"Aye," cried she, shaking her daughter by the sho
"you little minx! if your sister had not picked up these a inable verses which you chose to write on the absence o beggarly fellow, I suppose you would have finished the ness by running off with him! But you shall go dow Scotland, and be locked up for months, I won't have Sir tor Dundas's family disgraced by a daughter of mine,"

"For pity's sake, Lady Dundas," said Pembroke, ste between her vulgar Ladyship and the trembling Euph
"do compose yourself. I dare say your daughter is pa able. In these cases the fault generally lies with ou
We are the seducers."

Mary felt obliged to re-seat herself; and with pal tention, she listened to the reply of the frightened Euphe who, half assured that her whim of creating a mutual pa in the breast of Thaddeus was now no longer tenable, wi either shame or remorse exclaimed, "Indeed Mr. Som you are right. I never should have thought of Mr Co tine, if he had not teased me every time he came wit violent love."

Mary rose hastily from her chair. Though Eupl coloured at the suddenness of this motion, and the imm flash that she met from her eye, she went on: "I know Beaufort will deny it, because she thinks he is in love witl ıdeed, he has sworn a thousand times on his knees that s a Russian nobleman in disguise, and adored me above one else in the world."

oundrel!" cried Pembroke, inflamed with indignation s double conduct. Afraid to read in the expressive nance of Mary, her shame and horror at this discovery, ned his eyes on her with trepidation; when to his sur-
he beheld her standing perfectly unmoved, by the side sofa from whence she had arisen.
advanced with a calm step towards Euphemia; and,
hold of her hand which concealed her face whilst ıg this last falshood, drew it away; and regarding her ı serene but penetrating look, "Euphemia!" said she, know well, that you are slandering an innocent and ınate man. You know that never in his life did he give ıe slightest reason to suppose that he was attached to
And, as to myself, I can also clear him from making ions to me. Upon the honour of my word, I declare," sing herself to the whole group, "that he never breathed ınce to me beyond mere respect. By this last deviation hemia from truth you may form an estimate how far t she has alleged deserves credit."
young lady burst into a violent passion of tears; "I t be brow-beat and insulted, Miss Beaufort!" cried she, refuge in noise since right had deserted her; "You you would fight his battles through thick and thin! else ıuld not have fallen into fits yesterday, when I told you sent to jail."
last assault struck Mary motionless; and Lady Dundas, ıp her hands, exclaimed, "Good Lord, keep me from the l Misses of these times!—as for you, Miss Euphemia," she, seizing her daughter by the arm, "you shall leave
-morrow morning. I will have no tutoring and falling in my house; and for you Miss Beaufort," turning to who having recovered herself, stood at a little distance, l take care to warn Miss Dorothy Somerset to keep an r your conduct."
ıdam," replied she indignantly, "I shall never do any hich can dishonour either my family or myself; and of liss Dorothy Somerset is too well assured, to doubt for ant, even should calumny be as busy with me, as it has jurious to Mr. Constantine."
walked towards the door. When she passed Mr.
et who stood bewildered and frowning beside Miss

Dundas, she said in a collected and decisive voice, "Pem
I shall leave the room, but remember, I do not releas from your engagement."

Staggered by the open firmness of her manner, he after her as she withdrew, and was almost inclined to l that she possessed the right side of the argument. Mal not allow him to think so long. The moment the door on Miss Beaufort, both the sisters fell on him pellmell the prejudiced illiberality of the one, supported by the falsehoods of the other, soon dislodged all favourab pressions from the mind of Somerset, and filled him with displeasure.

In the midst of Diana's third harangue, Lady Dunda ing ordered Euphemia to be taken to her chamber, Mr. S set was left alone, more incensed than ever, against Tha whom he now considered in the light of an adventure cealing his poverty, and perhaps his crimes, beneath th of lies. That such a character could by means of h person, and a few meretricious talents, work himself ir confidence of Mary Beaufort, pierced her cousin to the and as he mounted the stairs, with an intent to seek her dressing-room, he could not forbear thinking what faction it would afford him to hear that Constantin hanged.

When he opened the room door, he found Miss Be with his aunt. The instant he appeared the ever bene face of Miss Dorothy contracted into a frown.

"Nephew!" cried she, "I shall not take it well in you give stronger credence to the passionate and vulgar tions of Lady Dundas and her daughters, than you ch bestow on the tried veracity of your cousin Mary!"

Pembroke felt that if his countenance had been a fa transcript of his mind, Miss Beaufort did not err in supp that he believed the foreigner to be a villain. Feeling possible to relinquish his reason, into what he now de nated the partial hands of his aunt and cousin, he persis his opinion to both the ladies, that their unsuspicious n had been rendered subservient to knavery and artifice.

"I would not willingly, my dear madam," said he, addr Miss Dorothy, "think so meanly of your sex as to im that an atrocity can exist in the female heart, which give birth to so cruel and unprovoked calumnies against nocent man. I cannot suspect the Miss Dundasses of needless guilt; particularly poor Euphemia, whom I

Lady Dundas forced me to read her verses; and they are too full of love and regret for this adventurer, to come from the same breast which could wantonly blacken his character. Such wicked inconsistencies in so young a woman are not half so probable as, that you my dear aunt and cousin, have both been deceived."

"Well nephew," returned the old lady, "you are very peremptory. Methinks a little more mercy of opinion would better become your youth! I knew nothing of this unhappy man's present distress, till Miss Beaufort mentioned it to me; but before she breathed a word in his favour, I had conceived a very high respect for his merits, from the first hour in which I saw him, I gathered by his deportment and conversation, that they were far above his fortunes. I thought so; I still think so; and, notwithstanding all which the Dundasses may choose to fabricate, I am determined to believe the assertions of an honest countenance."

Pembroke smiled, whilst he compelled his aunt's reluctant hand into his, and said, "I see, my dear madam, that you are bigotted to the idol of your fancy? I do not in the least doubt this Mr. Constantine's enchantments; but you must pardon me, if I keep my senses at liberty. I shall think of him as I could almost swear he deserves, although I am aware I hazard your affection by my firmness." He then turned to Mary, who, with a swelling and distressed heart, was standing by the chimney; "forgive me my dearest cousin," continued he, addressing her in a softened voice; "that I feel myself forced to appear harsh; it is the first time I ever dissented from you; it is the first time Mary, I ever thought you prejudiced!"

Mary drew the back of her hand over her glistening eyes. All the tender affections of Pembroke's bosom smote him at once; and throwing his arms round his cousin's waist, he strained her to his breast, and added, "Ah! why, my dear girl, must I love you better for thus giving me pain? Every way my darling Mary is more estimable. Even now, whilst I oppose you, I feel that, though your goodness is abused, it has been cheated into error by the affection of honourable calamities!"

Mary felt, "that if the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence in some circumstances, in others, a prudence of a higher order would justify her in declaring her thoughts." Accordingly she withdrew from the clasping arms of Mr. Somerset; and, whilst her beautiful figure seemed to dilate into more than its usual dignity, she mildly replied:—

"Think what you please, Pembroke; I shall not contend with you: Mr. Constantine is of a nature not to be hidden by obscurity; his character will defend itself; and all that I have to add, is this, I do not release you from your promise. Could a woman transact the affair with propriety, I should not keep you to so disagreeable an office; but I have passed my word to myself, that I shall 'neither slumber nor sleep,' till he is out of prison." She put a pocket-book into Pembroke's hand, and added, "take that, my dear cousin: and, without suffering a syllable to transpire by which he may suspect who served him, accomplish what I have desired."

"I will obey you, Mary," returned he looking gravely; "but I am sorry that such rare enthusiasm was not awakened by a worthier object. When you see me again, I hope I shall be enabled to say, that your ill-placed generosity is satisfied."

"Fie, nephew, fie!" cried Miss Dorothy, "I could not have supposed you capable of conferring a favour so ungraciously."

Mr. Somerset, pained at what he nominated the obstinate infatuation of Miss Beaufort: and, if possible, more chagrined by what he considered the blind and absurd encouragement of his aunt, lost the whole of her last reprimand in his hurry to quit the room.

Disturbed, displeased, and anxious, he stepped into a hackney-coach,—ordering it to drive to Newgate. He determined to go through the business without exposing himself to an interview with a man he must now condemn as an artful and unprincipled villain.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The first week of the Count's confinement was rendered less intolerable, by the daily visits of Mrs. Robson; who having brought his drawing materials, enabled him, through the means of the print-seller, to purchase some civility from the brutal and hardened people who were his gaolers. After the good woman had performed her diurnal kindness, Thaddeus used to turn to the sad circumference of his miserable apartment to seek amusement. When his pencil had accomplished its task, it wearied him: when he took up a book, having read it before, it failed to engage him. He possessed nothing to beguile the tedious day, and more tedious night.

His spirit was in solitude; in the most dismal solitude; banished and shut out from all that could render life desirable.

The elasticity and enterprise of soul, inherent in youth, renders no calamity so difficult to be borne, as is the fettering of its best years, and most active virtues, within the walls of a prison. Thaddeus felt this benumbing conviction in every pulse of his ardent and energetic heart. He retraced all that he had been. He looked on what he was. Though he had reaped glory when a boy, his "noon of manhood," his evening sun was to waste its light, and set in captivity.

At short and distant intervals, such melancholy reveries gave place to the pitying image of Mary Beaufort. It sometimes visited him in the day, and it always was his companion during night. He courted her lovely idea as a spell, that for a while, stole him from painful reflections. With an entranced heart, he recalled every lineament of her beautiful face, every dissolving note of that voice, which had hurried him into the rashness of touching her hand. One moment, he pressed her gold chain closer to his heart, almost believing what lady Tinemouth had insinuated; the next, he would sigh over his credulity, and return with desponding, though equally intense feeling, to her bewitching recollection.

The more he pondered on the purity of her manners, the elevated principles to which he could trace her actions, and, above all, the benevolent confidence with which she had ever treated him, (a man contemned by one part of her acquaintance, and merely received on trust by the remainder,) the more he found reasons to admire her character, and adore herself. When he drew a comparison between Miss Beaufort, and women of the same quality, whom he had seen in England and in other countries, he contemplated with delighted wonder that spotless mind, which having passed through the various dangers annexed to wealth and fashion, still bore itself uncontaminated. She was beautiful, and she did not regard it; she was accomplished, but she did not attempt a display: what she had acquired from education, the graces had so incorporated with her native intelligence, that the whole perfection of her character seemed to have been stamped at once by the beneficent hand of Providence.

Thaddeus never felt her numberless attractions so fascinating, as when witnessing the generous eagerness with which, forgetful of her own almost unparalleled talents, she pointed out merit, and dispensed applause to the deserving. Mary's nature was composed entirely of the gentlest elements, unalloyed by indiscrimination or insipidity. Whilst the Count saw that the urbanity of her disposition made her politeness universal, he perceived that neither rank, riches, nor splendour could extract from her bosom one spark of that lambent flame, which streamed from her heart like fire to the sun, towards the united glory of genius and goodness.

He dwelt on this lovely unsophisticated character with an enthusiasm bordering on idolatry. He recollected that she had been educated by the mother of Pembroke Somerset; and turning from the double remembrance with a sigh fraught with all the bitterness and sweetness of love, he acknowledged how much wisdom (which includes virtue) gives spirit and immortality to beauty; "Yes," cried he, "it is the fragrance of the flower, which lives after the bloom of its leaves are withered."

From the like seducing day-dreams, Thaddeus was one evening awakened by the entrance of the jailor into his cell. The man presented a sealed paper, and told him that he had brought it from a stranger, who, having paid the debts for which he was confined, had immediately withdrawn, desiring that the packet might be delivered to Mr. Constantine.

Scarcely crediting this information, Thaddeus hastily opened the letter, hoping that it might throw some light on his benefactor; a blank cover, enclosing notes to the amount of fifty pounds, presented itself. Surprised at this, he told the man to leave him, who, without much ceremony, was staring at the money over his shoulder; and sitting down, he tried to think who had acted so generously, and yet be so careful to hide their bounty.

He had seen sufficient proofs of a heedless want of charity in Miss Euphemia Dundas, to lead him to suppose that she could be so munificent and solicitous for concealment. Besides, how could she have learned his situation? He thought it was impossible: and that impossibility compelled an erratic hope of his present liberty having sprung from the friendship of Miss Beaufort, to pass by him with painful swiftness.

"Gracious heaven!" cried he, starting from his chair, "It is the indefatigable spirit of Lady Sara Roos, that I recognise in this deed; the generous but unhappy interest which she yet takes in my fate, has discovered my last misfortune, and thus seeks to relieve me!"

The moment he had conceived this supposition, he believed it; and, taking up a pen with a grateful, though disturbed soul, he addressed to her ladyship the following guarded note.

"To the Right Honourable Lady Sara Roos.

"An unfortunate exile, who feels himself already overpowered by the sense of not having deserved the notice which Lady Sara Roos has hitherto deigned to take of his misfortunes, was this morning liberated from prison in a manner so generous and delicate, that he can affix the act to no other than the noble heart of her ladyship.

"The object of this bounty, bending under the weight of obligations which he cannot repay, begs permission to re-enclose the bills which Lady Sara's agent transmitted to him; but, as the deed which procures his freedom cannot be recalled, he accepts, with the most grateful emotions, that new instance of her ladyship's goodness.

"Newgate."

Thaddeus despatched the letter by a porter, and was preparing another to acquaint Mrs. Robson of his release, when the good woman made her appearance. She hastened up to him with an animated countenance, and exclaimed before he had time to speak, "Dear Sir! I have seen a dear sweet lady, who has promised not to sleep till you are out of this horrid place!"

The suspicions of the Count, that his benefactress was indeed Lady Sara Roos, were now confirmed; seating his landlady in the only chair which furnished the apartment; to satisfy her sensitive decorum, he took his station on the table, and then said, "the lady has already fulfilled her engagement; I am free; and only wait for an answer to my acknowledgments, before I quit the prison."

At this assurance, the delighted Mrs. Robson, crying and laughing by turns, did not cease her ejaculations of joy, till the messenger, who had taken the letter to St. James's place, returned with a reply written by her ladyship, and evidently bletted with tears. Thaddeus took out the re-enclosed bills with a flushed cheek, and read as follows:

"I cannot be mistaken in recognising the proud and high-souled Constantine, in the writer of the lines which I hold in my hand. Could any thing have imparted to me more comfort than your generous belief that there is indeed some virtue left in my wretched and repentant heart, it would arise from the consciousness of having been the happy person who has succoured you in your distress. But no; that enjoyment was beyond my deserving. The bliss of being the lightener of your sorrows was reserved by heaven for a less criminal creature. I did not even know that you were in prison. Since our dreadful parting, I have never dared to inquire after you; and much as it might console me to serve one so truly valued, I will not insult your nice honour by offering any farther instance of my friendship, than what will evince my soul's gratitude to your prayers, and my acquiescence with the commands of duty.

"My husband is here, without perceiving the ravages which misery and remorse have made in my unhappy heart. Time, perhaps, may render me less unworthy of his tenderness; at present I detest myself.

"I return the bills: you may safely use them, for they were never mine. S. R."

The generous heart of Thaddeus bled over every line of this letter. He felt that it bore a stamp of truth, which did not leave him a moment in doubt that he owed his release to some other hand. Whilst he folded it up, his suspicions next lighted on Lady Tinemouth. He had received one short letter from her ladyship since her departure, mentioning Maria's staying in town to meet Mr. Montresor: Miss Beaufort's detention on account of Miss Dorothy's accident: and closing with the intelligence of her own safe arrival at the Wold. The idea struck him, that as he had delayed answering this letter in consequence of his late embarrassment, she had made some inquiries regarding him, which having led to a discovery of his situation, most probably Miss Egerton had visited Mrs. Robson by the commands of the Countess, and finding the information true, had proceeded these lengths to obtain his release.

According to these suppositions, he questioned his landlady about the appearance of the lady whom she had seen. Mrs. Robson replied, "She was indifferently tall, but so wrapped up that I could neither see her face nor figure, though I am certain from the softness of her voice, she must be both young and handsome. Sweet creature! I am sure she wept two or three times. Besides she is the most charitable soul alive, next to you, Sir, for she gave me a purse with nineteen guineas; and she told me she knew your honor's English friends."

This narration, substantiating his hope of Lady Tinemouth being his benefactress, that the kind Maria was her agent! and the gentleman who had defrayed the debt, Mr. Montresor; he found himself easier under an obligation, h a mysterious liberation would have doubled. He knew Countess's maternal love for him. To reject her present action, would be to sacrifice gratitude on the altar of id delicacy. He felt, that "nothing can be great, that it at to despise;" and rather than pain Lady Tinemouth, linquishing her bounty, he smothered in his breast the rs of a haughty repulsion, which having burst forth in rst hour of his misfortunes, was ever ready to consume vish that might engender the weight of obligation.

addeus quitted his cell; and, ordering that a coach might ought to the great gate of Newgate, he was obeyed; and thankfulness to heaven, for again being permitted to the wholesome breeze of a free atmosphere, he handed lighted landlady into the vehicle.
true it is, that advantages are only appreciated by com-
n; when the Count re-entered his humble apartment Martin's lane, he considered it a palace of luxury op-to the dungeon he had left.
h!" cried Mrs. Robson, pointing to a chair, "there is ry seat in which that dear lady sat! Sweet creature! if known that I durst believe all that she promised, I would fallen on my knees, and kissed her feet, for bringing your dear self!"
thank you, my dear madam," returned Thaddeus, smilith a brimming eye at such ardent demonstrations of on; "but where is little Nanny, that I may shake hands ier?"
child welcomed the Count with those animated ex-ons of joy, inseparable from a good and inexperienced
It being late, he retired at an early hour to his pil-here he found that repose, which had been sought in within the gloomy and (he supposed) eternal walls of a he morning, he was awakened by the light footsteps of tty waiting-maid entering the front room. His chamor being open, he asked her what was the hour? she

, nine o'clock; adding that she had brought a letter, one of the waiters from Slaughter's coffee-house had ft, with the information that he did so by the orders of nan in rich livery.
ddeus desired it might be given to him. The child and quitted the room. He saw that the superscripas in Miss Dundas's hand; and opening it with plea-ecause every thing interested him which came from the house that contained Mary Beaufort, to his amazement and consternation, he read the following passionate and intemperate lines:

"To Mr. Constantine.

"Mr. Constantine,

"By a miraculous circumstance, this morning, your deep and daring plan of villany has been discovered to Lady D—— and myself. The deluded victim, whom your arts and falsehoods would have seduced to dishonour her family by connecting herself with a vagabond, has at length seen through her error; and now detests you as much as ever your insufferable presumption could have hoped she would distinguish you with her regard. Thank heaven! you are completely exposed! This young woman of fashion (whose name I will not trust on the same page with yours) has made a full confession of your villanous seductions; for her own reprehensible weakness, in ever having deigned to listen to one so low. She desires me to assure you, that she hates you: and commands you never again to attempt the insolence of appearing in her sight. Indeed this is the language of every soul in the house, of Lady D——, Miss D—— S——, Miss B——, besides that of D—— D——.

"Harley-street."

Thaddeus read this ridiculous letter twice, before he could perfectly comprehend its meaning. In a paroxysm of indignation at the vile subterfuge under which he did not doubt Euphemia had screened some accidental discovery of her absurd passion, he hastily threw on his clothes, and determined, though in defiance of Miss Dundas's mandates, to fly to Harley-street, and clear himself in the eyes of Mary and her venerable aunt.

Having flown rather than walked, he arrived in sight of Lady Dundas's house, just as a coach, full of her ladyship's maids and packages, drove from the door. Hurrying up the step, he asked the porter, who was standing in the hall, if Miss Dorothy Somerset were at home.

"No," replied the man; "she and Miss Beaufort, with Miss Dundas and Mr. Somerset, went out of town this morning by eight o'clock; and my lady and Miss Euphemia about an hour ago set off for Dumbarton, in Scotland, where they mean to stay all the summer."

At this information, which seemed to be the sealing of his condemnation with Mary, Thaddeus felt his heart pierced to the core. Unacquainted till this moment with the torments attending the calumniated, he could scarcely subdue the tempest in his breast, when forced to receive the conviction, that the woman whom he loved above all the world, now regarded him as not merely a villain, but the meanest of villains.

He returned home, indignant and agitated. The knowledge that Pembroke Somerset had probably listened to the falsehoods of Euphemia, without suggesting one word in defence of him who had once been his friend, inflicted a pang more deadly than the rest. Shutting himself within his apartment, tossed and tortured in soul, he traversed the room, till resolving to seek redress from the advice of Lady Tinemouth, he descended the stairs: and telling Mrs. Robson that he should leave London next morning for Linconshire, begged her not to be uneasy on his account, as he went on business, and would return in a few days.

The good woman almost wept at this intelligence; and when she saw him depart, followed the wheels of the stage-coach with sighs and blessings. For the Count, his long journey passed in resentful reveries, or affectionate anticipations of the moment when he should pour out his gratitude to the maternal tenderness of Lady Tinemouth; and learn from her delicacy and experience, how to wipe from the minds of Miss Dorothy Somerset and her lovely neice, sentiments of him, so dishonouring, torturing, and false.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The porter at Lady Dundas's had been strictly correct in his account respecting the destination of the dispersed members of her ladyship's household.

Whilst Pembroke Somerset was sullenly executing his forced act of benevolence at Newgate, Miss Dundas suddenly took it into her ever-scheming head, to compare the merits of Somerset's rich expectancy with the pennyless certainty of Lascelles. She considered how high the wife of a baronet stood in the train of precedence over the humble cara sposa of a man, owning no other rank than a reflected lustre, shot from the coronet of an elder brother. Lady Somerset, she thought, would be a prettier salutation, than the empty courtesy of Honourable. Besides, Pembroke was very handsome; Lascelles only tolerably so: indeed some women had presum call him ugly; but they were odd mortals, who, not beli

the metempsychosis doctrine of the taylor and his decor adjuncts, could not comprehend that, although a mere h creature can have no such property, a man of fassion possess an elixir vitæ which makes age youth; defo beauty; and even transforms vice into virtue.

In spite of remembrance, which reminded Diana how amidst a little bevy of females, she had contended with mony that all Mr. Lascelles's teeth were his own; tha nose was not a bit too long, being an exact fac simile same feature which reared its sublime curve over the cious mouth of his noble brother, Lord Castle-Conway;
withstanding this, the Pythagorean pretensions of fa began to lose their ascendancy; and in the recesses o mind, when Miss Dundas compared the light elegan Pembroke's figure, with the heavy limbs of her present Pembroke's dark and ever animated eyes, with the goos orbs of Lascelles: she dropped the parallel; and resolvi captivate the heir of Somerset-castle, admitted no remo jilting the brother of Castle-Conway.

To this end, before Pembroke's return from New Diana had told her mother of her intention to accom
Miss Dorothy down to the baronet's; where she woul main, till her ladyship should think Euphemia migh trusted to rejoin her in town. Neither Miss Dorothy Miss Beaufort liked this arrangement; and with an a heart, the latter prepared to take her seat next morning, early hour, in the travelling equipage which was to co
them all into Leicestershire.

At supper, Pembroke sullenly informed Mary of the cess of her commands; that Mr. Constantine was free.
assurance, though imparted with so ungracious an air, lai head with less distraction on her pillow; and, as she ste into Sir Robert's carriage next day, enabled her with ease to deck her lips with smiles. She felt that the pene ing eyes of her cousin were never withdrawn from her offended with his perverseness, and their scrutiny, she tri baffle their inspection. She attempted gaiety, when she g would have wept. But when the coach mounted the t Highgate Hill, and discovered a last view of that city, w contained the being whose happiness was the sole obj her thoughts and prayers, she leaned out of the windo hide a tear which she could not repress; feeling that an

and another would start, she complained of the dust; and, pulling her veil over her eyes, drew back into the corner of the carriage.—The trembling of her voice and hands during the performance of this little artifice, too well explained to Pembroke what was passing in her mind; at once dispelling the gloom which had shrouded his own countenance, he turned towards her with a compassionate tenderness in his words and looks, which, gradually softening her displeasure into the easy conversation of reciprocal affection, rendered the remainder of their journey less irksome.

When, at the end of the second day, Mary found herself in the old avenue leading to the base of the hill that sustains the revered walls of Somerset Castle, a mingled emotion took possession of her breast; and when the carriage had attained the foot of the highest terrace, she sprung impatiently out of it, and hastening up the stone stairs into the front hall, met her uncle at the door of the breakfast parlour, where he held out his arms to receive her.

"My Mary! My darling," cried he, embracing her now wet cheek, and straining her throbbing bosom to his own, "Why, my dear love," added, he, almost carrying her into the room, "I am afraid this visit to town has injured your nerves! Whence arises this agitation?"

Mary knew that it injured her peace; and now, that the flood-gates of her long-repelled tears had opened, it was beyond her art or the soothings of her affectionate uncle to stay them. A moment after, her cousin entered the room, followed by Miss Dorothy and Miss Dundas. Miss Beaufort hastily arose to conceal what she could not check, and kissing Sir Robert's hand, asked permission to retire, under the pretence of regaining those spirits which had been dissipated by the fatigues of her journey.

In her own chamber she did indeed struggle to recover herself. She shuddered at the impetuosity of her feelings when once abandoned of their reins; and resolved from this hour to hold a stricter guard over the consequences of her ill-fated passion.

She sat down in the window of her apartment, and, looking down the extensive vale of Somerset, watched the romantic wanderings of the Witham winding its course through the domains of the castle, and nourishing the roots of those immense oaks, which still wave their centennial arms over its quiet stream. Mary reflected on the revolution which had taken place in her mind, since she walked on its banks the evening that preceded her visit to London. Then she was free as air, and gay as the lark; each object was bright and lovely to her eyes; hope seemed to woo from the green slope, every remote dingle; all nature breathed of joy, because her own breast was the home of gladness. Now, all continued the same, but she was changed. Surrounded by beauty, she acknowledged its presence; the sweetness of the flowers bathed her sense in fragrance; the setting sun, gilding the heights, shed a yellow glory over the distant hills; the birds were hailing the fallen due that spangled every leaf; Mary gazed around and sighed heavily, when she said to herself, "Even in this paradise I shall be wretched. Alas! my heart is far away! my soul lingers about one whom I may never more behold! about one who may soon cease to remember that such a being as Mary Beaufort is in existence. He will leave England!" cried she, raising her hands and eyes to the glowing heavens. "He will live, he will die, far, far from me! In a distant land he will wed another, whilst I shall know no wish that strays from him."

Whilst Mary indulged in these soliloquies, she forgot both Sir Robert and her resolution, till he sent her maid to beg, that if she were better, she would come down and make tea for him. At this summons, Miss Beaufort dried her eyes, and descended with an assumed serenity to the saloon, where the family were now assembled. The Baronet, having greeted Miss Dundas with an hospitable welcome, seated himself between his sister and his son; and whilst he received his favourite beverage from the hands of the lovely Mary, he found that comfort had once more re-entered his bosom.

Sir Robert Somerset was a man whose appearance alone must have attracted respect. His person bore the stamp of dignity; and his manners, which possessed the exquisite polish of travel, secured him universal esteem. Though little beyond fifty, the various perplexities to which he had been obnoxious in his youth, had not only rendered his hair perfectly grey; but, by clouding his once brilliant eyes with thoughtfulness, had marked his aspect with old age and melancholy. The Baronet's entrance into gay life was celebrated for wit and vivacity: he was the animating spirit of every party: when strange to tell, an inexplicable metamorphosis took place. Soon after his return from abroad, his marriage with Miss Beaufort, (a woman whom he loved to madness,) taking place, excess of happiness seemed to change his nature, and gave his character a gradual tinge of sadness. After her ladyship's death, the alteration in his mind produced still more extraordinary effects, and shewed itself more than once in all the terrors of threatening insanity.

The latest attack of the kind which assailed him, was about the middle of last winter; it seized him under the appearance of a swoon, as he sat reading the newspaper at breakfast; he was carried to bed, and awoke in a delirium, which menaced either immediate death or the total extinction of his intellects. However neither of these dreads being confirmed, in the course of several weeks, to the wonder of every body, he recovered both his health and his sound mind. Notwithstanding this happy event, the circumstances of his danger having deeply affected the hearts of his family, he continued to be a very anxious object of attention. Indeed solicitude did not terminate with them; the munificence of his disposition having spread itself through every country in which he owned a rood of land, as many prayers ascended for the repose of his spirit, as had ever petitioned heaven from the mouths of "monkish beadsmen," in favour of power or virtue.

Since the demise of Lady Somerset, this excellent man drew all his comfort from the amiable qualities of his son Pembroke. Sometimes in his livelier hours, which came "like angel visits, few and far between," he amused himself with the playfulness of the little Earl of Arun, the pompous erudition of Mr Loftus, (who was become his lordship's tutor,) and giving occasional entertainments to the gentry of his neighbourhood.

Of all the personages contained within this circle, (which the hospitality of Sir Robert extended to a circumference of thirty miles) Lord Berrington, was the most respected.

The numerous visitants who attended the Somerset hunt, were too gay to be admitted with intimacy. A son of one of these itinerant families, (which, ever on the full chase of pleasure, had fixed itself at Woodhill Lodge, on the right of the little town of Grantham,) by calling at the castle soon after the arrival of the London party, caused a trifling change in its disposition.

When Richard Shafto was ushered into the saloon, he nodded to Sir Robert, and turning his back on the ladies, told Pembroke that he had ridden to Somerset on purpose to bring him to Woodhill Lodge.

"Upon my soul," cried he, "if you don't come, I will leave my mother. Would you believe it, that, on account of Sir Hallerand having gone out plenipotentiary to some damned place on the continent, she has taken it into her head to rusticate in the country till his return? Upon my soul, I am moped to death! There is not a creature but yourself, within twenty miles, that I would speak to; not a man worth a six pence. I wish to heaven my father had broken his neck before he had accepted that rascally embassy, which encumbers me with the charge of an old woman!"

After this dutiful wish, which brought down a weighty admonition from Miss Dorothy, the young gentleman promised to beg her pardon for his ill manners, provided she could persuade Pembroke to accompany him to the Lodge. Mr. Somerset did not evince much alacrity in his consent; but purposely to rid his family of such a noisy guest, he rose from his chair, and acquiescing in the sacrifice of a few days to good nature, bade his father farewell, and gave orders for a ride to Grantham.

As soon as the gentleman had left the saloon, Miss Dundas ran up stairs, and, from her dressing-room window in the west tower, pursued the steps of their horses cantering down the winding steep into the high road. An abrupt angle of the hill hiding them at once from her view, she turned round with a toss of the head, and flinging herself into a chair, exclaimed, "Now I shall be bored to death by his abominable prosing family! I wish the devil had taken Shafto before he thought of coming here!"

In consequence of the humor which engendered the above no very flattering compliment to the society at the castle, Miss Dundas descended to the dining-room with sulky looks and a chilling air. She swallowed what the baronet laid on her plate with an indolent appetite, cut her meat into mince, and dragged the vegetable over the table-cloth. Miss Dorothy coloured at this indifference to the usual neatness of her damask covers: but Miss Dundas was so completely in the sullens, that heedless of any other feelings than her own, she continued to pull and knock about the things just as her ill-humor dictated.

The petulence of this lady's behaviour did not in the least assimilate with the customary tranquillity of Sir Robert's table: and, when the cloth was drawn, he could not refrain from expressing his concern, that Somerset Castle appeared so little calculated to afford satisfaction to a daughter of Lady Dundas. Miss Dundas attempted some awkward declaration, that she was never more amused, never happier. But the small credit which Sir Robert gave to her assertion, was fully honoured the next morning, by the ready manner in which she accepted a casual invitation to spend the ensuing day and night at Lady Shafto's. Her ladyship called on Miss Dorothy, and, intending to have a party in the evening, invited the two young ladies to return with her to Grantham, and be her guests for a week. Mary, whose spirits had much to combat before they could regain their former serenity, declined her civility; while, with a gleam of pleasure, she heard it accepted by Miss Dundas, who departed with her ladyship for the Lodge.

Whilst the enraptured Diana, all life and glee, bowled along with Lady Shafto, anticipating the delight of once more seating herself at the elbow of Pembroke Somerset; Mary Beaufort, relieved from a load of ill-requited attentions, walked out into the park to enjoy in solitude, the intoxicating sorrow of thinking on the unhappy and far distant Constantine. Regardless of the way, her footsteps, though robbed of elasticity by nightly watching and daily regret, led her beyond the park, to the ruined church of Woolthrope, its southern boundary. Her eyes were fixed on the opposite horizon. It was the extremity of Leicestershire; and far, far behind those hills, was that London, which contained the object dearest to her soul. The wind seemed scarcely to breathe as it floated towards her; but it came from that quarter; and believing it laden with every sweet which love can fancy, she threw back her veil to inhale its balm; then blaming herself for such baby weakness, she turned blushing, homewards, and wept at what she thought the unreasonable tenacity of her passion.

The arrival of Miss Dundas at the Lodge was communicated to the two young men on their return from a traverse on foot of half the country, in quest of game. The news extracted an oath from Shafto; but rather pleased Somerset, who augured some amusement from her attempts at wit and judgment. Tired to death, and dinner being over when they entered with ravenous appetites, they swallowed their uncomfortable meal in a remote room; then, throwing themselves along the sofas, yawned and slept for nearly two hours.

Pembroke waked first, suddenly jumped on the floor, and shaking his disordered clothes, exclaimed, "Shafto! Get up. This is abominable! Efaith, I cannot help thinking that if we spend one half of our days in pleasure, and the other in lolling off its fatigues, we shall have passed through life more to our shame than our profit!"

"Then you may take the shame and leave me the profit;"

cried his companion, turning himself round; "so good night to you."

Pembroke rang the bell. A servant entered.

"What o'clock is it?"

"Eight, sir,"

"Who are up stairs?"

"My lady, sir, and a large party of ladies."

"There now!" cried Shafto, yawning and kicking out his legs. "You surely won't go to be bored with such damned maundlin company?"

"I choose to join your mother," replied Pembroke. "Are there any gentlemen, Stephen?"

"One, sir; Doctor Denton."

"Confound you!" roared Shafto; "what do you stand jabbering there for? you won't let me sleep. Can't you send away the fellow, and go look yourself?"

"I will, if you can persuade yourself to rise off that sofa, and come with me."

"May the devil catch me if I do! Get about your business, and leave me to mine.

"You are incorrigible, Shafto?" returned Pembroke as he closed the door. He ascended the stairs to change his dress, and before he gained the second flight, he had resolved not to spend two other whole days in the company of such an unmannered, unideaed cub.

On Mr. Somerset's entrance into Lady Shafto's drawing-room, he saw many ladies, but only one gentleman, who was the before-mentioned Doctor Denton, a poor shallow-headed, parasitical animal. Pembroke, having seen sufficient of him to despise his pretensions both to science and sincerity, passed his wide smirk and eager inquiries with a distancing bow, and took his seat beside of the now delighted Miss Dundas. The vivid spirits of Diana, which she managed should be peculiarly sparkling when he made his appearance, entertained him; when compared with the insipid sameness of her ladyship, or the brutal ribaldry of her son, her mirth was wit, and her remarks wisdom.

"Dear Mr. Somerset!" cried she, "how good you are to break this sad solemnity. I vow, until you showed your face, I thought the days of Paganism had revived, and that, lacking of men, we were assembled here to celebrate the mysteries of the Bona Dea."

"Lacking of men!" replied he, smiling, "You have overlooked the assiduous Doctor Denton."

"O no; that is a cameleon in man's clothing. He breaths air, he eats air; he emits air; and a most pestilential breath it is; only observe how he is pouring nonsense into the ear of yonder sable statue."

Pembroke directed his eyes as Miss Dundas had desired him; they fell on Doctor Denton, who stood whispering, bowing, and pressing his breast before a lady in black, who sat almost concealed by the window curtain. The lady put up her lip, the Doctor proceeded: she frowned, he would not be daunted! the lady rose from her seat, and slightly bending her head, crossed the room. Whilst Mr. Somerset was contemplating her majestic figure, and fine, though pale features, Miss Dundas touched his arm; smiling satirically, she repeated in an affected voice:

"Hail! pensive Nun! devout and holy!
"Hail, divinest Melancholy!"

"If she be melancholy," returned Pembroke, unconsciously sighing, "I would for ever say,

'Hence, unholy Mirth, of Folly born!'"

Miss Dundas reddened. She had never liked this interesting woman, who was not only too handsome for competition, but possessed of an understanding whose temper would not tolerate ignorance and presumption, Diana's ill-natured impertinence having several times received deserved chastisement from that quarter, she was vexed to the soul, when Pembroke closed his animated response with the question, "Who is she?"

Miss Dundas, rather too bitterly for the success of her design on his heart, iterated his words, and then answered, "Why, she is crazed. She lives in a place called Harrowby Abbey, at the top of that hill," continued she, pointing through the opposite window to a distant rising ground, on which the moon was shining brightly; "and, I am told, frightens the cottagers out of their wits by her midnight strolls."

Hardly knowing how to credit this wild account, Pembroke asked his informant if she were serious.

"Never more so."

"Her eyes are uncommonly beautiful. You must be jesting" returned he; "they seem perfectly reasonable."

Miss Dundas laughed. "Like Hamlet's, they 'know not seems, but have that within which passeth show!' Believe me, she is mad enough for Bedlam; and of that I could soon convince you. I wonder how Lady Shafto thought of inviting her at all!"

"Well," cried Pembroke, "if those features announce madness, I shall never admire a look of sense again."

"Bless us!" exclaimed Miss Dundas, "you are wonderfully struck! Don't you see, she's old enough to be your mother?"

"That may be," answered he, smiling; "nevertheless she is one of the most lovely women I ever beheld. Come, tell me her name."

"I will satisfy you in a moment," rejoined Diana: "and then away with your rhapsodies! She is the very Countess of Tinemouth, who brought, as her most particular friend, that vagabond foreigner to our house, who would have run off with Phemy."

"Lady Tinemouth!" exclaimed Pembroke, "I never saw her before. My ever lamented mother met her whilst I was abroad, and she esteemed her highly. Pray present me to her."

"Impossible!" replied Diana, vexed at the turn his curiosity had taken; "I wrote to her about the insidious wretch, and now we don't speak."

"Then I will introduce myself," answered he: he was moving away, when Miss Dundas (whose delight lay in tormenting those whom she could not subjugate) caught hold of his arm, and by some attempts at badinage and raillery, withheld him in his place, till the Countess made her farewel curtesy to Lady Shafto, and the door was closed.

Disappointed at this manœuvre, Pembroke reseated himself, and pondering on what could be the reason why his aunt and cousin had not heard of her ladyship's arrival at Harrowby, he determined to wait on her next day. Regardless of every word which the provoked Diana addressed to him, he remained silent and meditating, till the loud voice of Shafto, roaring in his ear, made him turn suddenly round. Miss Dundas tried to laugh at his reverie, though she knew that such a flagrant instance of inattention was death to her hopes: but Pembroke, not inclined to partake in the jest, coolly asked his bearish companion what he wanted?

"Nothing, upon my soul," cried he, "but to hear you speak. What the devil were you looking at on the carpet? Miss Dundas tells me, that you have lost your heart to yonder grim Countess, that my mother wanted me to gallant up the hill?"

"Shafto!" answered Pembroke, rising from his chair, "You cannot be speaking of Lady Tinemouth?"

"Efaith, I am!" roared he: "and if she be such a scamp as to live without a carriage, I won't be her lacquey for nothing. Two miles are not to be tramped over by me, with no better companion than an old painted woman of quality."

"Surely you cannot mean," returned Pembroke, "that her ladyship was to walk from hence?"

"Without a doubt," cried Shafto, bursting into a horse laugh; "you would be clever to see my Lady Stingy in any other carriage than her clogs."

Irritated at the malice of Miss Dundas, and despising the vulgar illiberality of Shafto, Pembroke, without deigning a reply, abruptly left the room; and hastening out of the house, ran rather than walked, in hopes of overtaking the Countess and her servant before they reached Harrowby.

He crossed the little wooden bridge that lies over the Witham; he scoured the fields, and leaping over every stile and gate that impeded his way, gained the enclosure that leads to the top of the hill, where he descried a light moving, and very rightly conjectured it must be the lanthorn carried by her ladyship's attendant. Another spring over the shattered fence cleared all obstacles, and he found himself close to Lady Tinemouth, who was leaning on the arm of a gentleman. Pembroke stopped at this sight; supposing that she had been met by some person belonging to the town; whose readier gallantry now occupied the place which Miss Dundas had prevented him from filling, he was preparing to retreat, when Lady Tinemouth happening to turn her head, imagined, from the hesitating embarrassment of his manner that he was a stranger who had lost his way, and accosted him with that inquiry.

Pembroke bowed in some confusion; and related the simple fact, of his having heard that she had quitted Lady Shafto's without any guard but the servant; and, that he had hurried out, the moment he had learned the circumstance, to proffer his services. The Countess not only thanked him for such attention, but constrained by a civility which she would rather at that instant have been excused from, asked him to walk forward with her to the Abbey, and partake of some refreshment.

"But," added she, "though I perfectly recollect having seen another gentleman in Lady Shafto's room, besides Dr. Denton, I have not the honour of knowing your name!"

"It is Somerset," returned Pembroke; "I am the son of that Lady Somerset, who, during the last year of her life, had the happiness of being intimate with your ladyship."

Lady Tinemouth declared her pleasure at this meeting; and, turning to the gentleman who was walking in silence by her side, "Mr. Constantine," said she, "allow me to introduce to you the cousin of the amiable Miss Beaufort."

Thaddeus, who had too well recognized the voice of his false friend, in the first accents which he addressed to the Countess, with a swelling heart, bent his head to the cold salutation of Somerset. Hearing that her ladyship's companion was no other than the same Constantine whom he had liberated from prison, Pembroke was stimultated with a desire to unmask his double villany to Lady Tinemouth; and feeling a curiosity to see the man whose person and meretricious qualities had blinded even the judgment of his aunt, he readily obeyed the second invitation of the Countess, and consented to go home and sup with her.

Meanwhile Thaddeus was agitated with a variety of emotions. Every tone of Pembroke's voice, reminding him of happier days, pierced to his heart, whilst a sense of his ingratitude awakened all the pride and indignation of his soul. Full of resentment, he determined that, whatever might be the result, he would not shrink from an interview, the anticipation of which, Pembroke (who had received from himself an intimation of the name that he had assumed) seemed to regard with such unfeeling indifference.

Lady Tinemouth having no conception that Somerset and the Count had any personal knowledge of each other, begged the gentlemen to follow her into the supper-parlour. Pembroke with no inconsiderable degree of rudeness, pushed by his friend, and arrived at the side of the Countess before Thaddeus, who felt himself insulted in every nerve, could summon coolness to enter the room with a composed step. He did so; and taking off his hat, laid it down on the sofa. Lady Tinemouth began to express her joy at his arrival. The eyes of Pembroke now became fixed on the calm but severe countenance of the man before him; he stood by the table with an air so full of princely greatness, that the candid heart of Pembroke Somerset soon wispered to him, "Sure nothing ill can dwell in such a breast."

Still his eyes followed him when he turned round, and when he bent his head to answer the Countess, in a voice so low that it escaped his ear. Pembroke was bewildered. There was something in the features, in the mein of this foreigner, so like his friend Sobieski. But then, Sobieski was all frankness and animation; his cheek blazed with the rich colouring of youth and happiness; his eyes flashed pleasure, and his lips were decked with smiles. On the reverse, the person before him was not only considerably taller, and of more manly proportions, but his face was pale, reserved, and haughty; besides, he did not appear even to recollect the name of Somerset; and what made the supposition at once untenable, his own was Constantine.

These reasonings having passed through the mind of Pembroke in less time than they can be repeated, left his heart unsatisfied. The mounted blood remained on his cheeks; his bosom beat; and keeping his searching and ardent gaze rivetted on the man who was either his friend or his counterpart, Lady Tinemouth withdrew from the table, and the eyes of the two young men met. Thaddeus turned paler than before; there is an intelligence in the interchange of looks which cannot be mistaken; it is the communication of souls, and there is no deception in their language. Pembroke flew forward, and catching hold of his friend's hand, exclaimed in an impetuous voice, "Am I right? Are you not Sobieski?"

"I am," returned Thaddeus, half choaked with emotion, and hardly knowing what to understand by Somerset's behaviour.

"Gracious heaven!" cried he, still grasping his hand, and can you have forgotten your friend, Pembroke Somerset?"

The ingeneous heart of Thaddeus felt the words and manner of Pembroke to be the language of truth; and, trusting that some mistake had involved his former conduct, he at once cast off all suspicion; and, throwing his arm round him, strained him to his breast, and burst into tears.

"Yes," replied Pembroke, turning to the Countess, and wiping away the tears that trembled on his cheek; "nothing could have given me pain at this moment, but the conviction that the preserver of my life, and my most generous protector, should in this country, have endured the most abject distress, rather than let me know that it was in my power to be grateful."

Thaddeus took out his handkerchief, and for a few minutes concealed his face. The Countess looked on him with tenderness; believing that he would sooner regain composure were he alone with his friend, she stole unobserved out of the room. Pembroke affectionately resumed; "But I hope, my dear Sobieski, that you will never leave me more. I have an excellent father, who, when made acquainted with my obligations to you and your noble family, will glory in loving you as a son."

Thaddeus having subdued "the woman in his heart," raised his head with an expression in his eyes, far different from that which had chilled the blood of Pembroke on their first encounter.

"Circumstances," said he, "dear Somerset, have made me greatly injure you. A strange neglect on your side since we separated at Villanow, gave the first blow to my confidence in your friendship. Though I lost your direct address, I had written to you often, and yet you persevered in silence. When I came to England, after having witnessed the destruction of all that was dear to me in Poland, and then of Poland itself, I wished to give your faithfulness another chance; I addressed two letters to you; I even delivered the last at your door myself, and I saw you in the window when I sent it in."

"By all that is sacred," cried Pembroke vehemently, and amazed, "I never saw any letter from you! I wrote you many. I never heard of those you mention. Indeed I should even now have been ignorant of the Palatine and your mother's cruel fate, had it not been too circumstantially related in the newspapers."

"I believe you," returned Thaddeus, drawing an agonizing sigh, at the dreadful picture which the last sentence had recalled; "I believe you; though, at the time I speak of, thought otherwise: for, next day, both my letters were re-enclosed in a blank cover, directed as if by your hand, and brought by a servant, with a message that there was no answer!"

"Powers of Heaven!" exclaimed Somerset, "there must be some villany in this! Dearest Thaddeus," cried he, breaking off abruptly, and grasping his hand, "I would have flown to you, had it been to meet my death! But why did you not come in yourself? Who prevented you? Then no mistake could have happened. Why did you not come in yourself!"

"Because I was uncertain of your sentiments: my first letter had remained unnoticed, and my heart, dear Somerset," added he, pressing his hand, "would not stoop to solicitation."

"Solicitation!" exclaimed Pembroke with warmth, "you save a right to demand my life! But there is some rascally business in this affair! nothing else could have carried it through: if any of my servants have dared to open these letters——Merciful heaven," cried he, interrupting himself, "how you must have despised me!"

"I was afflicted," returned Thaddeus, "that the man whom my family had so warmly loved, could prove so unworthy; and, afterwards, whenever I met you in the streets, which I think was once or twice, I confess, to pass you cut me to the heart."

"And you have met me!" exclaimed Pembroke, "and I not see you! I cannot comprehend it."

"Yes," answered Thaddeus, "and the first time you was going into the play-house. I believe I called after you."

"It is now ten months since!" returned Pembroke; "I remember very well, that somebody called out my name, while I was handing Lady Coningsby and her sister into the door. I looked about, and not seeing any one I knew, thought I must have been mistaken. But why, dear Sobieski, why did you not follow me into the theatre?"

Thaddeus shook his head, and smiling languidly; "My poverty would not permit me," replied he, "but I waited in the hall till every body had left the house, in hopes of intercepting you as you passed."

Pembroke sprung from his chair at these last words; and with the most vehement voice and action, exclaimed, "I see it! That rascal Loftus is at the bottom of it all! He followed me into the theatre, he must have seen you, and his cursed selfishness took fright. Yes, it must be him! He would not allow me to return that way; when I said I would, he told me a thousand lies about the carriage coming round; and like a fool, I went out by another door."

"Who is Mr. Loftus?" inquired Thaddeus, surprised at his friend's suspicion; "I do not know such a man."

"What," returned Pembroke, walking about the room in a heat, "Don't you remember, that Loftus is the name of the scoundrel who persuaded me to volunteer against Poland? to screen his baseness, I have brought all this upon myself."

"Now I recollect it;" replied Thaddeus, "but I never saw him."

"Yet I am not less certain that I am right," replied Somerset; "I will recount to you my reasons. After I had quitted Villanow, you remember I met him at Dantzic? Before we left that port, he implored almost on his knees, that in pity to his mother and sisters, whom he supported out of his salary; I would refrain from incensing my parents against him by relating any circumstance of our visit to Poland. The man shed tears as he spoke; and, like a fool, I consented to keep the secret, till the vicar of Somerset (a poor soul, ill of the dropsy) dies, and he be in possession of the living. When we landed in England," continued Pembroke, casting down his eyes, "I found that the cause of my sudden recall was the illness of my dear mother. But heaven denied me the comfort of beholding her again; she had been buried two days before I reached shore." He paused for a moment: and then resumed, "for near a month after my return, I could not quit my room; a fever had seized me: but on my recovery, I immediately wrote, both to you and to the Palatine. I repeated these letters at least every six weeks during the first year of our separation; yet you persisted in being silent. Hurt as I was at this neglect, I felt that gratitude demanded some sacrifices from pride, and I continued to write even in the spring following. Meanwhile the papers teemed with Sobieski's actions, Sobieski's fame: and, believing that increasing glory had blotted me out of your memory, I resolved henceforth, to regard our friendship as a dream, and never speak of it more."

Confounded at this double misapprehension, Thaddeus, with a glowing countenance, expressed his regret for having doubted his friend; and repeating the assurance of having been punctual to his promise of correspondence, even when he deemed him inconstant, acknowledged that nothing short of a premeditated scheme could have wrought such undeviating miscarriage.

"Aye," returned Pembroke, reddening with awakened anger; I could swear that Mr. Loftus has all my letters in his bureau at this moment! No house ever gave a man a better opportunity to play the rogue in, than ours. It is a custom with us to lay our letters in a morning on the hall table, whence they are sent to the office; and in the same way, when the post arrives, they are spread out to their several owners to take as they pass to breakfast. Owing to this management, I cannot doubt the means by which Mr. Loftus, under the hope of separating us forever, has intercepted every letter to you, and every letter from you. I suppose the wretch feared that I would repent my engagement, if our correspondence were allowed. He trembled, lest the business should be blown before the vicar died, and he, in consequence, lose the expected living, and his present situation about Lord Arun. A villain! For once he judged rightly; I will unmask him to my father, and show him what it is to purchase subsistence at the expense of honour and justice."

Thaddeus, who could not withhold instant credence to these evidences of chicanery, tried to calm the violence of his friend: who only answered, by insisting on his immediate return with him to Somerset Castle.

"I long to present you to my father," cried Pembroke; "when I tell him who you are; of your kindness to me, how rejoiced will he be! How happy, how proud to have you as his guest; to show the warm gratitude of a Briton's heart! Indeed, Sobieski, you will love him; for he is generous and noble like your inestimable grandfather. Besides," added he smiling with a sudden recollection, "there is my lovely cousin Mary; who, I verily believe will actually fly into your arms!"

Thaddeus felt the blood rush over his cheeks at this speech of his friend's, and half suppressing a sigh, he shook his head.

"Don't look so like an infidel," resumed Somerset, "If you have any doubts of possessing her affections, I can put you out of your pain by a single sentence! When Lady Dundas's household, with myself amongst them, (for little did I know that I was joining the cry against my friend!) were asserting the most flagrant instances of your deceit to Euphemia, Mary alone withstood the whole tide of malice, and compelled me to release you."

"Gracious Providence!" exclaimed Thaddeus, catching Pembroke's hand, and looking eagerly and agitatedly in his face, "Was it you who came to my prison? Was it Miss Beaufort who visited my lodgings?"

"Indeed it was," returned his friend, "and I blush for myself, that I quitted Newgate without an interview. Had I followed the dictates of common decency, I should have seen you; and then, what pain would have been spared my dear cousin! what a joyful surprise would have awaited myself!"

Thaddeus could only reply by pressing his friend's hand. His brain whirled. He could not decide on the nature of his feelings; one moment he would have given worlds to throw himself at Miss Beaufort's feet, the next, he trembled at the prospect of meeting her so soon.

"Dear Sobeiski," cried Pembroke, "how strangely you receive this intelligence! is it possible that the love of Mary Beaufort can be rejected?"

"No," cried the Count, looking up, his fine face flushed with emotion: "I adore Miss Beaufort. Her virtues possess my whole heart. Can I forget, that I am a beggar? That even now I exist on her bounty?" The eyes of Thaddeus, and the sudden tremor which shook his frame, finished this appeal to his fate.

Pembroke felt it enter his soul. To hide its effects, he threw himself on his friend's breast, and exclaimed, "Do not injure me and my father by these sentiments! You are come, dearest Sobieski, to a second home. Sir Robert Somerset will consider himself ennobled in supplying the place of your lamented grandfather!—and my cousin Mary, as you love her, shall bind us still closer; you must be my relation, as well as my friend!"

Thaddeus replied with animated acknowledgments of Pembroke's affection,—"But," added he, "I must not allow the generous spirit of my dear Somerset to believe, that I can live a dependant on any power but the Author of my being. I consider nothing so degrading as an existence wasted in idleness; therefore, if Sir Robert Somerset will assist me to procure some honest means of acquiring support, I shall thank him from my soul. In no other way, my kindest friend, can I ever be brought to tax the gratitude of your father."

Pembroke coloured at this, and exclaimed, in a voice of displeasure, "Gracious Heaven, Sobieski, what can you mean? Do you imagine that ever my father or myself can forget that you were little less than a prince in your own country? That when in that high station you treated me like a brother? That you preserved me, even when I lifted my arm against your life? Can we be such monsters as to forget all this? or think that we can act justly by you, in permitting you to labour for your bread? No, Thaddeus, my very soul spurns at the idea. Your mother sheltered me as a son; and I insist that you allow my father to perform the same part with you! Besides, you shall not be idle; you may have a commission in the army, and I will follow you."

The Count squeezed the hand of his friend, and, looking gratefully in his face whilst he shook his head, replied, "Had I a hundred tongues, my generous Pembroke, I could not express my sense of your friendship; it is indeed a cordial to my heart; it imparts to me an earnest of happiness which I thought had fled me for ever: but it shall not allure me from my principles. I am resolved not to live a life of indolence; and I am resolved not, at this period, to enter the British army

No," added he, emotion elevating his tone and manner; "rather would I toil for subsistence by the sweat of my brow, than be subjected to the necessity of acting in concert with those ravagers who destroyed my country! I cannot fight by the side of the Russians! I cannot enlist under their allies! I will not be led out to devastation! Mine was and ever shall remain, a defensive sword: and, should danger threaten England, I shall be as ready to withstand her enemies, as I ardently, though ineffectually, opposed those of unhappy Poland."

Pembroke recognised the high souled Thaddeus of Warsaw, in this lofty burst of enthusiasm; aware that his father's munificence, and manner of conferring esteem and obligations, would go farther towards removing these scruples of delicacy than all his arguments, he did not attempt to combat a resolution which he knew he could not subdue; but tried to prevail on him to become his guest, till something could be arranged to suit his wishes.

Thaddeus consented to accompany Somerset to the castle the day after that in which Sir Robert should be apprised of his coming. Pembroke perceived that the morning had surprised them; and shaking his friend warmly by the hand, he bade him farewell; then hastening down the hill, he arrived at the lodge just as the servants were opening the shutters.

Having given orders to the groom, whom he met in the passage, he wrote a slight apology to Shafto for his abrupt departure; and mounting his horse, galloped, full of delight, towards Somerset-castle.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Next morning, when the Countess and Thaddeus were seated at breakfast, her ladyship expressed surprise and pleasure at the scene which she had witnessed the preceding night, at the same time intimating some mortification on the discovery, that he had withheld any of his confidence from her. Sobieski soon obtained her ladyship's pardon, by relating the manner of his first meeting with Mr. Somerset, four years ago, at the battle of Zielim, and the consequent events of that momentous period.

Lady Tinemouth wept over the distressful fate that marked the residue of his narrative, with a tenderness which endeared her to his soul. But when, in compliance with his inquiries, she informed him how she came to be at Harrowby Abbey when he supposed her on the Wolds, it was his turn to feel pity; and to shrink from himself, that he had drawn existence from the same source with Lord Harwold.

"Indeed," added the Countess, "you must have had a most tedious journey from Harwold Park to Harrowby; and nothing but my pleasure could exceed my astonishment, when I met you last night on the hill."

"Thaddeus declared that travelling a few miles farther than he had intended, was no fatigue to him; yet, had it been otherwise, the happiness he then enjoyed would have acted as a panacea for worse ills, could he have seen her ladyship looking as well as when she left London.

Lady Tinemouth smiled. "You are very right, Sobieski; I am worse than when I am in town. My solitary journey to Harwold harassed me much; and when my son sent me orders to leave it, because his father wanted the place for the autumnal months, I was labouring under a severe cold caught in travelling. Nevertheless, I obeyed him; and heart-broken and in pain, I arrived here last week. How kind you were to follow me. Who informed you of the place of my destination? Hardly any of Lady Sophia's household?"

"No," returned Thaddeus; "I luckily had the precaution to inquire at the inn where the coach stopped, what part of Lady Tinemouth's family were at the Park; and when I heard that the Earl himself was there, my next question was, where then is the Countess? The landlord very civilly told me of your having had a carriage from his house a day or two before, to carry you to one of his lordship's seats within a few miles of Somerset-castle. Hence, from what I had heard your ladyship say of the situation of Harrowby, I judged it must be the Abbey; and so I sought you at a venture."

"And a happy issue I hope will arise from your wanderings! This rencontre with so old a friend as Mr. Somerset, is a pleasing omen. For my part, I was ignorant of the arrival of the family at the Castle, till yesterday morning, when I sent off a messenger to apprise my dear Miss Beaufort that I am in her neighbourhood. To my great dissatisfaction, Lady Shafto found me out immediately; and when in compliance with her teazing invitation, I walked down to sit an hour with her last night, little did I expect that I should meet the amiable cousin of our sweet friend. So delightful an accident has amply repaid me for the pain I felt in seeing Miss Dundas in her Ladyship's house: an insolent and reproachful letter which she wrote to me on your account, has rendered her an object of my most decided dislike."

Thaddeus smiled and bowed. "Since, my dear Lady Tinemouth, her groundless malice, and Miss Euphemia's folly, have failed in estranging either your confidence, or the esteem of Miss Beaufort from me, I despise and pardon them both. Perhaps I ought to pity them, for is it not a difficult ordeal to pass through the enchantments of wealth and adulation, and emerge as pure as when we entered? Unclouded fortune is indeed a trial of spirits; and how brightly does Miss Beaufort rise from the blaze! Surrounded by splendour, homage, and indulgence, she is yet all nature, gentleness, and virtue!"

The Countess, who wished to appear cheerful, rallied him on the warmth of his expressions: then rising from her seat, she left him to his meditations, and retired to dress.

The family at Somerset had just drawn round the breakfast-table when Pembroke arrived. During the repast they expressed their surprise at the suddenness of his return. Mary, after repeating the contents of the note which she had received the preceding day from Lady Tinemouth, requested that her cousin would be kind enough to drive her in his curricle that morning to Harrowby.

"I will, with pleasure," answered he: "I have seen her ladyship and even supped with her last night."

"How came that?" asked Miss Dorothy.

"I shall explain it to my father, whenever he will honour me with an audience," returned he, addressing the Baronet, with all the joy of his heart looking out at his eyes; "will you indulge me, my dear sir, by half an hour's attention, any time before noon?"

"Certainly," replied Sir Robert; "at present I am going into my study, where I must settle my steward's books; but the moment I have finished I will send for you."

Miss Dorothy walked out after her brother to attend to her aviary; and Mary remaining alone with her cousin, made some inquiries about the Countess's reasons for coming to the Abbey.

"I know nothing about them," replied he gaily, "for she went to bed almost the instant I entered her house. Too good to remain where her company was not wanted, she left me to enjoy a most delightful tete-a-tete with a dear friend from whom I parted four years ago. In short we sat up the whole night together, talking over past scenes, and present ones too, for, I assure you, you were not forgotten."

"Me! What had I to do with it?" replied Mary, smiling, "I cannot recollect any friend of yours that you have not seen these four years."

"Well, that is strange!" answered Pembroke, "he remembers you perfectly; but, true to your sex, you affirm what you please; though I know that there is not a man in the whole world whom you prefer before him."

Mary shook her head, laughed and sighed, and extricating her hand from his, threatened to leave him if he would not be serious.

"I am serious," cried he, catching her arm, and pulling her back to her seat; "Would you have me swear I have seen him you most wish to see?"

Mary regarded the expression of his countenance with a thrill, which vanished as soon as felt; and resuming her chair, quietly said, "You can have seen no man that is of consequence to me; so, whoever your friend may be, I have only to congratulate you on a meeting which affords you such extreme delight."

Pembroke burst into a laugh at her composure. "So cautious! Yet I verily believe you would answer my transports, did I tell you who he is. However, you are such a sceptic, that I won't hint even one of the many fine things he said about you."

Mary smiled incredulously.

"I could beat you, cousin," exclaimed he, "for this oblique way of saying that I am telling lies! But I will have my revenge on your curiosity; for on my honour I declare," added he emphatically, "last night I met with a friend at Lady Tinemouth's, who, four years ago, saved my life; who entertained me several weeks in his house; and, who has seen and adores you! 'Tis true, on my hopes of heaven; and I have promised, that you will repay these heavy obligations, by marrying him. What do you say to this, my sweet Mary?"

Miss Beaufort looked anxious at the serious and energetic manner in which these rapid asseverations were uttered; even the sportive kiss that ended the question, did not dispel the gravity with which she prepared to reply.

Pembroke perceiving her intent, prevented her by exclaiming, "Cease Mary, cease! I see you are preparing a false statement. Let truth prevail, and you will not deny who it was that subdued your judgment, to any indulgence? You cannot conceal from me, that the wanderer Constantine possesses your affections?"

Mary reddened with pain and displeasure; and rising from her seat, "I did not expect this cruel, this ungenerous speech from you, Pembroke!" cried she, averting her brimming eyes; "What have I done to deserve so rude, so unfeeling a reproach?"

Pembroke threw his arms round her waist. "Come," said he, in a tender voice, "don't be tragical. I never meant to reproach you, child; I dare say, if you gave your heart, it was only in return for his. I know you are a grateful girl; and I verily believe, you won't find much difference between my friend, the young Count Sobieski, and the forlorn Constantine."

A suspicion of the truth flashed across Miss Beaufort's mind; unable to speak, she caught hold of her cousin's hands, and looking eagerly in his face, her eyes declared the question she would have asked.

Pembroke laughed triumphantly; but a servant entering to tell him that Sir Robert was ready, he strained her to his breast exclaiming, "Now I am revenged! Farewell! I leave you to all the pangs of doubt and curiosity!" He then flew out of the room with an arch glance at her distressed countenance, and hurried up stairs.

Mary clasped her trembling hands together as the door closed on Pembroke. "O gracious Providence," cried she, "What am I to understand by this mystery, this joy of my cousin's? Can it be possible that the illustrious Sobieski and my contemned Constantine are the same?" A burning blush overspread her face and bosom at the expression my which had escaped her lips.

Whilst the graces, the sweetness, the dignity of Thaddeus, captivated her notice; his sufferings, his virtues, and the mysterious interest which involved his history, had fixed her attention, and awakened her esteem. From these grounds, the step is short to love. "When the soul is conquered, the heart surrenders at discretion." But Mary knew not that she had advanced further than what rendered retreat possible, till the last scene at Dundas-house, by forcing her to defend Constantine against the charge of loving her, compelled her to feel how much she wished that the truth were otherwise.

Poor and lowly as he seemed, she found that her whole heart and life were wrapped in his remembrance; that his worshipped idea was her most precious solace, her property, her dear treasure, on which she banquetted in secret. It was the companion of her walks, the monitor of her actions. Whenever she planned, whenever she executed, she asked herself how would Constantine consider this? and accordingly did she approve or condemn her conduct.

Though separated far from the idol of her memory, thus was the impression which he had stamped on her heart ever present. The shade of Laura visited the solitude of Vanluse; the image of Constantine haunted the walks of Somerset. The loveliness of nature; its leafy groves and verdant meadow; its blooming mornings, and luxuriant sunsets; the romantic shadow of twilight, of the soft glories of the moon and stars; all, as they pressed beauty and sentiment upon her heart, awoke it to the remembrance of Constantine; she saw his image in every thing, she felt his soul in all. Subtle and undefinable is that ethereal chord which unites our tenderest thoughts with their chain of association!

Before this conversation, in which Pembroke had mentioned the name of Constantine with such badinage and ambiguity, he had never heard him spoken of by Mary or his aunt, without declaring a displeasure nearly amounting to anger. Hence, when he now so strangely altered his tone, Miss Beaufort could not escape retaining the only conclusion which could be drawn: that he had seen in the person of him she most valued, some one whom he loved. Prior to this time she more than once suspected, from the opinions which Somerset occasionally repeated respecting the affairs of Poland, that he could only have acquired so nice a knowledge of its events, by having visited the country itself. She proposed her suspicions to Mr. Loftus; he denied the fact; and she thought no more on the subject, till the present ambiguous hints of her cousin conjured up these doubts anew; and led her to suppose that, if Pembroke had not disobeyed his father so far as to go to Warsaw, he had at least met with the Count Sobieski in some other realm. The possibility of this young hero, of whom fame had spoken so loudly, might be the mysterious Constantine, bewildered and delighted her. The more she compared what she had heard of the one, with what she had witnessed in the other, the more she was reconciled to the probability of so wild a hope. Besides, she could not for a moment, believe that her cousin would so cruelly sport with her delicacy and feelings, as to awaken expectations which he could not fulfil.

Agitated by a suspense which bordered on agony, with a beating heart she heard his quick step descending the stairs,

The door opened, and Pembroke, flying into the room, caught up his hat: as he was darting away again, Mary, unable to restrain her impatience, with an imploring voice ejaculated his name. He turned round, and displayed to her amazed sight a countenance, in which no vestige of its former animation could be traced; his cheek was flushed; and his eyes, full of distraction, shot a wild fire, that immediately struck to her heart. Unconscious what she did, she ran up to him; but Pembroke, pushing her back, with parched lips, and in a hurried voice, exclaimed, "Don't ask me any questions, Mary, if you would not drive me to madness."

"O Heaven!" cried she, catching his arm, and clinging to him, while the velocity of his motion dragged her into the hall; "tell me, has any thing happened to my guardian? to your friend? to Constantine?"

"No," replied he, looking at her with a face full of desperation; "but my father commands me to treat him like a villain."

Mary could hardly credit her senses, at this confirmation, that Constantine and Sobieski were one; turning giddy with the tumultuous delight which rushed over her soul, she staggered back a few paces, and leaning against the now open door, tried to recover breath to regain the room she had left.

Pembroke having escaped from her grasp, ran furiously down the hill, mounted his horse, and forbidding any groom to attend him, galloped towards the high road with the impetuosity of a madman. All the powers of his soul were in arms. He felt himself wounded, dishonoured, stigmatized with ingratitude, and every baseness which can degrade the mind of man.

Sir Robert Somerset had founded a hatred of the Poles and Hungarians, on the recollection of an injury which he had received in early youth from some of those people. In this instance his dislike was implacable; and when his son set out for the continent, he positively forbade him to enter either Poland or Hungary. Nevertheless, when Pembroke joined the Baronet in his library, he did it with confidence. With a bounding heart and animated countenance, he recapitulated how he had been wrought up by the Russian noblemen to take up arms in their cause, and march into Poland. At these last words the brow of the father contracted.

Pembroke, who expected some marks of displeasure, hastened to obliterate his disobedience, by narrating the event which introduced, not only the young Count Sobieski to his succour but the consequent friendship of the whole of that princely family.

Sir Robert made no other reply to this, than by a deeper frown; and when Pembroke, with all the ardour of youth, attempted to describe the calamitous death of the Palatine, the horrors that attended the last hours of the Countess, and the succeeding misery of Thaddeus, who was now in England, no language can paint the rage which burst at once from the Baronet. He stamped on the ground, he covered his face with his clenched hands; then turning on his son, with the most tremendous fury he exclaimed, "Pembroke! you have outraged my commands! And, never will I pardon you, if this young man be brought into my sight."

"Merciful Heaven!" cried Pembroke, thunderstruck at a violence which he almost wished might proceed from any cause but intention; "Surely something has agitated my father! What has discomposed you, sir?"

Sir Robert shook his head, whilst his teeth appeared to grind against each other. "Don't mistake me," replied he, in a firm voice, "I am perfectly in my senses. It depends on you that I shall continue so. You know my oath against these accursed Polanders; and I repeat again, if you ever bring that young man into my sight, you shall never see me more."

A cold dew overspread the body of Pembroke. He would have caught hold of his father's hand, but he held it back. "Oh, sir!" said he, "you surely cannot intend that I shall treat with ingratitude the man who saved my life?"

Sir Robert did not vouchsafe him an answer, but continued walking up and down the room, till his agitation seemed to increase at every step, he opened the door of an interior apartment, and retired, bidding his son remain.

The horror-struck Pembroke, waited for near a quarter of an hour before his father re-entered. When he did appear, the deep gloom of his eye gave no encouragement to his son, who, hanging down his head, recoiled to speak first. Sir Robert approached, with a composed but severe countenance, and said, "I have been seeking every palliation that your conduct will admit, and I can find none. Before you quitted England, you well knew my abhorrence of the Polish nation. One of that country, many years ago, wounded my happiness in a way that I shall never recover. From that hour I took an oath never to enter its borders; and never to suffer one of its people to come within my doors. Rash, disobedient boy!

know my disposition, and you have seen the emotion which this dilemma has shaken my soul! But, be it on wn head; you have incurred obligations which I cannot I will not perjure myself to defray a debt contracted t my positive and declared principles. I never will see slander you speak of: and it is my express command on f my eternal malediction, that you break with him en-broke with a deep groan, fell into a seat. Sir Robert ded;

pity your distress, Pembroke, but my resolution cannot
ken. Oaths are not to be broken with impunity. You either resign him or resign me.—We may compromise ebt of gratitude; I will give you deeds to put your friend cession of five hundred a year for life forever: but from ir you tell him so, you must never see him more."
Robert was preparing to quit the room; when Pembroke, g from his chair, threw himself in agony on his knees, ching him by the skirt of his coat, implored him for God's o recal his words; to remember that he was affixing ting dishonour on his son! "Remember, dear sir!"
e, holding his struggling hand, "that the man to whom er money as a compensation for insult, is of a nature too o receive it. He will reject it and spurn me; and I el that I deserve his scorn. For mercy's sake, spare agony of harrowing up the heart of my preserver: of g reproach from his eyes!"
ave me!" cried the Baronet, breaking from him; "I unless you wish to incur my curse, do as I have comd."
s outraged, thus agonized, Pembroke had appeared the eyes of his cousin Mary, more like a distracted e, than a man possessed of his senses. Shortly after his departure, her apprehension was petrified to a dreadful y of some cruel ruin to her hopes, by an order which ived, in the hand-writing of her uncle, commanding her attempt visiting Lady Tinemouth, while the Count
i continued to be her guest.
ly knowing whether he went, Pembroke did not it the ruined aisle which leads up to the habitable part Abbey, till near three o'clock. He inquired of the ser-no took his horse, whether the Countess and Mr. Con-were at home. The man replied in the affirmative.

but added with a saddened countenance, that he feared neither of them could be seen,

"For what reason?" demanded Somerset.

"Alas! sir," replied the servant, "this day, at noon, whilst my lady was dressing, she was seized with a violent fit of coughing, which ended in the rupture of a blood vessel. It continued to flow so long, that Mr. Constantine told the apothecary whom he had summoned, to send for Dr. Cavendish, a physician of his acquaintance, who is now at Stamford. The Doctor is not yet arrived, and Mr. Constantine will not leave my lady."

Though Mr. Somerset was truly concerned at the illness of the Countess, the respite it afforded him from immediately declaring the ungrateful message of Sir Robert, gave him no inconsiderable degree of ease.—Some little relieved by the hope of being one day spared the anguish of displaying his father in a disgraceful light, he entered the Abbey; and commissioned a maid-servant to inform Thaddeus that he was below.

In a few minutes the girl returned with the following lines scrawled on a piece of paper.

"I am grieved that I cannot see my dear Somerset to-day; and more grieved for the cause; I fear my revered friend is on her death bed, I have sent for Dr. Cavendish, who is now at Stamford; doubtless you know that he is a man of first rate abilities; if human skill could preserve her, I might yet have hopes; but her disorder is a consumption, and its stroke is sure. I am now sitting at her bed-side, and writing what she dictates, to her husband, her son, and her daughter: painful, you may believe, is the task! I cannot, my dearest Somerset, add more, than my hopes of seeing you soon; and that you will join in prayers to heaven for the restoration of my inestimable friend with your faithful SOBIESKI."

"Alas! unhappy, persecuted Sobieski!" thought Pembroke, as he closed the paper; "To what art thou doomed! Some friends are torn from thee by death: others desert thee in the hour of trouble!"

He took out his pencil, to answer this distressing epistle, but he stopt at the first word: he durst not write that his father would fulfil any one of those engagements which he had so largely promised: and throwing away the pencil and paper, he left a verbal declaration of his sorrow at what had happened, and an assurance of calling next day. Turning his back on a house which he had left in the morning with such animating hopes, he remounted his horse, and, melancholy and slow, rode about the country till evening; so unwilling was he to return to that home, which now threatened him with the frowns of his father, the tears of Mary Beaufort, and the miserable reflections of his own wretched heart.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Doctor Cavendish, not having quitted his friend at Stamford, set off for Harrowby the instant Mr. Constantine's messenger arrived; and, before midnight, alighted at the Abbey.

When he entered Lady Tinemouth's chamber, he found her ladyship supported in the arms of Thaddeus, and struggling with a second rupture of the lungs, which seemed to threaten immediate dissolution. As he approached the bed, Thaddeus turned his eyes on him with an expression that powerfully told his fears. Dr. Cavendish silently squeezed his hand; then taking from his pocket some styptic drops which he had brought on purpose, he made the Countess swallow them, and soon saw that they succeeded in stopping the blood.

Thaddeus and his friend remained by the side of the suffering Lady Tinemouth till towards ten in the morning, when she sunk into a gentle sleep. Complete stillness being necessary to continue the repose, the Doctor proposed leaving a maid to watch by her ladyship; and drawing the Count out of the room, descended the stairs.

Mr. Somerset, who had arrived half an hour before, met them in the breakfast parlour. After a few kind words exchanged between the parties, they all sat down with dejected countenances to their melancholy meal. Thaddeus was too much absorbed in the scenes he had left, to swallow any thing but a dish of coffee.

"Do you think Lady Tinemouth is in imminent danger?" inquired Pembroke of the Doctor.

Dr. Cavendish sighed, and turning to Thaddeus, directed to him the answer which his friend's question demanded. "I am afraid, my dear Mr. Constantine," said he, in a reluctant voice, "that you are to sustain a new trial! I really fear, that her ladyship cannot live eight and-forty hours."

Thaddeus threw down his eyes and shuddered, but made no reply. Further remarks were prevented by a messenger from the Countess, who desired Mr. Constantine's immediate attendance at her ladyship's bed-side. He obeyed. In half an hour he returned with the tears yet wet on his cheek.

"Dear Thaddeus!" cried Pembroke, rising and taking his hand, "I trust the Countess is not worse? This emotion of yours is too distressing; it afflicts my very heart." Pembroke felt that it rent it; for he could not help internally acknowledging, that when Sobieski should close the eyes of Lady Tinemouth, he would be paying the last sad office of his last friend. That dear distinction he durst no longer arrogate to himself. Denied the fulfilment of its duties, he felt that to retain the title, would be an assumption without a right.

Thaddeus drew his hand over his again brimming eyes; "The Countess herself," said he, "feels the truth of what Dr. Cavendish told us. She sent for me to beg as I loved her, or wish to see her die in peace, to devise some means of bringing her daughter to the Abbey to-night. As for Lord Harwold, she says, his behaviour since he arrived at manhood, has been of a nature so cruel and unnatural, that she would not draw upon herself the misery, or him the added guilt, of a refusal: for Lady Albina, who has been quiescent in all their barbarities, she trusts, she might be prevailed on to seek a last embrace from a dying parent. It is this request," added Thaddeus, "that has thus agitated me. When she pictured to me, with all the fervour of a mother, her doating fondness for this daughter, (on whom, whenever she did venture to hope, all her fairy dreams had rested;) when she wrung my hands, and beseeched me, as if I had been the sole disposer of her fate, to let her see her child once more before she died; I could only promise every exertion to effect it; and with an aching heart, I came to consult you."

Dr. Cavendish was opening his lips to speak; but Somerset, in his eagerness to relieve his friend, did not perceive it, and immediately answered: "I will undertake this very hour what you have promised. I know that Lord Tinemouth's family are now at the Wold. It is only thirty miles distant. I will send a servant to have relays of horses ready. My curricle, which is at the door, will be more convenient than a chaise; and I will engage to be back before to-morrow morning. Write a letter, Thaddeus," continued he, "to Lady Albina; tell her of her mother's situation; and though I have never seen her ladyship, I will give it into her own hand, carry her off directly, even were it in the face of her ally father."

he pale cheeks of Thaddeus were flushed with a momenhectic; turning to Dr. Cavendish, he begged him to e, whilst he walked out with his friend to order the iage. Pembroke was thanked for his zeal, but it was not words; they were too weak vehicles to convey strong ngs: Thaddeus pressed his hand, and accompanied the on with a look that spoke volumes. The warm heart of broke, expanding under the animated gratitude of his d: he sprang into his seat, and forgot, till he had lost sight Harrowby Hill, how soon he must appear to that friend most ungrateful of men.
was near four in the afternoon, before Mr. Somerset left urricle at the little inn which skirts the village of Har-
pe. The paling belonging to Lord Tinemouth's park, only a few yards distant; but, fearful of being observed, broke sought a more obscure part; and scaling a wall red by the branches of high trees, he found a way to the e through an almost impassible thicket.
e watched two hours for the appearance of Lady Albina, ose youth and elegance he thought would equivocally nguish her from the rest of the Earl's houshold,) but in . Desponding of success, he was preparing to change his on, when he heard a sound among the withered leaves, the next moment, a beautiful young creature passed the behind which he was concealed. The fine symmetry of profile assured him that she must be the daughter of Lady mouth. She stopped to gather a china-aster: Pembroke wing that no time ought to be lost, gently emerged from recess; but not so stilly as to escape the ear of Lady na, who instantly looking round, screamed, and would fled, had he not thrown himself before her, and ex-med, "Stay, Lady Albina! For heaven's sake, stay! I from your mother!" Her ladyship gazed fearfully in his and tried to release her hand, which he had seized to ent her flight.
Do not be alarmed;" continued he, "no harm is intended
I am the son of Sir Robert Somerset, and the friend our mother, who is now on the point of death. She ores to see you this night, (for she has hardly an hour to ) to hear from your own lips, that you do not hate her!"
dy Albina, now wholly given up to his relation, trembled dfully; and with faded cheeks, and quivering lips, replied,

"Hate my mother! O, no! I have ever dearly loved her!"

A flood of tears prevented her speaking further; and Pembroke, perceiving that he had gained her confidence, put the Doctor's letter into her hand. The gentle heart of Lady Albina bled at every word which her almost blinded eyes read over: turning to Pembroke, who stood contemplating her lovely countenance with the deepest interest, she said, "Pray, Mr. Somerset, take me immediately to my mother." If she were to die before I can arrive, I shall be made miserable for life. Alas! alas! I have never been allowed to behold her! Never been allowed to visit London, because my father knew that I believed my poor mother innocent, and would have seen her, if it were possible."

Lady Albina wept violently as she spoke, and giving her hand to Pembroke, added, timidly looking round to the house, "You must take me now. We must hasten away, lest we should be surprised. If Lady Sophia were to know that I have been speaking with any body out of the family, I should be locked up for months."

Pembroke did not require a second command from his beautiful charge, but conducting her through the unfrequented paths by which he had entered, soon seated her in his curricle: he sheltered her delicate form with his great coat, and tied down her straw hat with his cambric handkerchief; then whipping up his horses, set off on full gallop, towards the melancholy goal of his enterprise.

The tender Lady Albina, whose ingenuous mind had ever been proof against the malicious insinuations of Lady Sophia to the prejudice of Lady Tinemouth, sat beside Mr. Somerset, sometimes mute with sorrow; sometimes lamenting, with all the artless eloquence of nature, the injuries of her dying parent, and her own unhappiness, in having been so long withheld from paying duty where she owed so much affection.

Whilst these two anxious travellers were pursuing their sad journey, the inhabitants of the Abbey were distracted with apprehensions that the Countess would expire before their arrival. Ever since Lady Tinemouth had been informed, that Mr. Somerset was gone to the Wold, hope and fear agitated her almost to suffocation; at length, wearied out with solicitude and expectations, she turned her dim eyes upon Thaddeus, and forcing a smile, said in a languid voice, "My dear friend, it must be near midnight. I shall never see the morning; I shall never in this world see my child. I pray you thank Somerset for all the trouble I have occasioned; and my hter, my Albina!" added her ladyship, hardly able to ulate, "O! Father of mercies!" cried she, holding up her ed hands, "pour all thy blessings on her head; she has r wilfully given this broken heart a pang!"

ie Countess had hardly ended speaking, when Thaddeus d a bustle on the stairs; suspecting that it might be the al of his friend, he made a sign for Dr. Cavendish to go inquire. His heart beat violently, whilst he kept his eye on the door, and held the fainting pulse of Lady Tine-h in his hand. The Doctor re-entered, and in a low voice pered, "Lady Albina is here."
ie words acted like magic on the fading senses of the itess; with preternatural strength she started from her pil-and catching hold of Sobieski's arm with both hers, cried,
! give her to me whilst I have life!"
dy Albina appeared, led in by Pembroke, but instantly ing his hand, with an agonizing shriek, she rushed tos the bed, and flung herself into the extended arms of nother. Those arms closed on her, and the head of the itess rested on her bosom.
. Cavendish soon perceived, by the struggles of the young that she was in convulsions: taking her off the bed, he gned her to Pembroke and Thaddeus, who carried he.
nother apartment: he remained to assist the Countess.
bina was removed; but the eyes of her amiable and in-mother, were never again unclosed: she had breathed ast sigh in grateful ecstacy on the bosom of her daughter;
ieaven had taken her spotless soul to itself.
ing convinced that the Countess was indeed no more, the Doctor left her remains in charge with the women, and ring to the adjoining room, found Lady Albina yet sense-n the arms of his two friends. She was laid on a sofa, Cavendish was pouring some drops into her mouth, when scried Thaddeus gliding softly out of the room; desirous are him the shock of suddenly seeing the corpse of one a he loved so dearly, he said, "Stop, Mr. Constantine, I re you do not go into the Countess's room!"
ie eyes of Thaddeus turned with quickness on the dis-d face of the physicians; one glance explained what the r durst not speak; and hastily saying, "I shall obey
' he hurried from the chamber.
the Count's rapid descent from Lady Albina's room to reakfast parlour, he too plainly perceived, by the tears of the servants, that he had now no sorrows to regret but his own. He darted from the clamorous laments of those honest people into the parlour, and shutting the door, threw himself down on a sofa, but rest induced thought, and thought harrowed up his soul. He started from his position; he paced the room in a paroxysm of anguish: he would have given worlds for one tear to relieve his oppressed heart. Ready to suffocate, he threw open a window, and leaned out. Not a star appeared to light the sky; the wind blew freshly; and with parched lips, he inhaled it, as the reviving breath of heaven.

He was sitting on the window-seat, with his head leaning against the casement, when Pembroke entered unobserved walking up to him, he laid his hand upon his arm, and ejaculated, in a tremulous voice, "Thaddeus, dear Thaddeus!"

Thaddeus rose at the well known sounds; they reminded him that he was not yet alone in the world; and throwing himself upon the bosom of Mr. Somerset, he exclaimed, "Heaven has still reserved thee, my dear Pembroke, to be my comforter! In thy friendship," added he, wiping away the tears which relieved his bursting heart; "I shall find affection similar with those which are gone forever; my friend, my brother! you are the last cord that binds me to the world."

Pembroke received the embrace of his friend; he felt his tears upon his cheek; but he could neither return the one, nor sympathize with the other. The conviction, that he was soon to sever that cord which bound them to each other; that he was to cut asunder that knot which ought to have united them forever; that he was to deprive the man who had saved his life, of the only stay of his existence, and abandon him at once to despair! all these ideas struck him to the soul; and grasping his friend's hand, he gazed at his averted and dejected features, with a look of desperate horror. "Sobieski," cried he, "whatever may happen, never forget, that I swear, I love you dearer than my life! And, when I am forced to abandon my friend, I shall not be long of abandoning what will then be worthless to me."

Not perceiving the phrensy of eye which accompanied this energetic declaration, Thaddeus gave no other meaning to the words, than believing it to be the most expressive assurance of affection that the forceful nature of his friend could devise.

The entrance of Dr. Cavendish disturbed the two young men, to whom he immediately communicated the increasing indisposition of Lady Albina.

"The shock," said he, "which she has received from the meeting and death of her mother, has so materially shaken her delicate frame, that I have ordered her to bed, and administered an opiate, which I hope will procure some repose; and you, my dear sir," added he, addressing the Count, "you had better seek a little rest! The stoutest constitution might sink under what you have lately endured. Pray, allow Mr. Somerset and myself to prevail on you, on our accounts, if not on your own, to retire for half an hour."

Thaddeus in disregard of his personal comfort, never infringed on that of others; he felt that he could not sleep; but he knew it would gratify his benevolent friends to suppose that he did; and accordingly without opposition, he went to a room, and throwing himself on the bed, lay for nearly an hour, ruminating on what had passed. There is an omnipresence in thought, or a velocity producing nearly the same effect, which brings within the short space of a few minutes the images of many foregoing years. In almost the same moment, Thaddeus pondered on his strange meeting with the Countess, her melancholy story, her forlorn death-bed, the fatal secret that her vile husband and son were his father and brother; and her daughter whom his warm heart acknowledged as a sister, was with him under the same roof, and, like him, the innocent inheritor of her father's shame.

Whilst these multifarious and painful meditations were agitating his purturbed mind, Dr. Cavendish found repose on a couch, and Pembroke Somerset, every instant feeling greater abhorrence to his ungrateful task, resolved once more to try the influence of intreaty on the otherwise generous spirit of his father. With a half hoping, half desponding heart, he commenced his last attempt, to shake, if possible, so fatal a resolution.

"To Robert Somerset, Bart., Somerset Castle.

"I have not ventured into the presence of my dear father, since he uttered those dreadful words, which I would give up my existence to believe I had never heard. You denounce a curse upon me if I oppose your will, to immediately break all connexion with the man who preserved my life. When I think on this; when I remember that it was from you I received a command so inexplicable in yourself, so disgraceful to me, I am nearly mad; and what I shall be, should you, by repeating your injunctions, force me to obey them, Heaven only knows! but I feel that I cannot survive the loss of my honour, and the sacrifice of my character for every principle of virtue, which such conduct must for ever destroy.

"O my father! I conjure you! reflect, before, in compliance with an oath, which it was almost guilt to make, you decree your son to everlasting shame and remorse! Act how I will, I shall never be happy more. I cannot live under your malediction; and should I give up my friend, my conscience will reproach me at every instant of my existence. Can I draw that breath which he prolonged, and cease to remember, that I have abandoned him to want and misery? It were vain to flatter myself, that he will condescend to escape either by the munificence which you offer as a compensation for my freindship. No; I cannot believe that this sensible and independent nature is so changed: circumstances never had any power over the nobility of his soul.

"The hand of misfortune, which threw Count Sobieski friendless on the bounty of England, cannot make him appear otherwise in my eyes, than as that idol of Warsaw, whose smile was honour, whose friendship conferred distinction. Though deprived of the splendour of command; though the eager circle of friends no longer cluster around him; though a stranger in this country, and without a home; though in place of an equipage and retinue, he is followed by calamity and neglect; yet, in my mind, I still see him in his car of triumph: I see not only the opposer of his nation's enemies, but the vanquisher of his own desires; I see the heir of a princely house, even when deserted by mankind, yet encompassed by his virtues; I see him though cast out from a hardened and unjust society, still surrounded by the lingering spirits of those who have fled to better worlds!' And this is the man, my dear father, (whom I am sure, had he been of any other country than Poland, you would have selected from all other men, to be the friend and example of your son,) this is he whom you command me to thrust away!

"I beseech you to reconsider this injunction! I am now writing under the same roof with him: it depends on you, my ever revered father, whether I am doing so for the last time; whether this is the last day in which your son is to feel himself a man of honour; whether he is henceforth to be a wretch overwhelmed with shame and sorrow!

"I have not yet dared to utter one word of what your cruel orders dictated, to my unhappy friend; he is now retired to a room to obtain some rest, after the anguish of witnessing the death of Lady Tinemouth, who died this night, in consequence of an illness which only lasted eight-and-forty hours. Should I have to tell him, that he is to lose me too—but I cannot add more. Your own heart, my dear father, must tell you that my soul is on the rack, till I have an answer to this letter.

Before I shut my paper, let me implore you on my knees! whatever you may decide, do not hate me: do not load my breaking heart with a parent's curse!—Whatever I may be, however low and degraded in my own eyes, still, that I have sacrificed what is most precious to me, to my father, will impart the only consolation that will then have power to reach your dutiful son,

"PEMBROKE SOMERSET.

"Harrowby Abbey,
"Five o'clock in the morning."

Dr. Cavendish remained in a profound sleep, whilst Pembroke, with an aching heart, having written the above letter and dispatched it with a man and horse, tried to compose himself to half an hour's forgetfulness of life and its turmoils; but he found his attempts as ineffectual as those of his friend.

Thaddeus tossed and tumbled on his restless pillow. Reluctant to disturb the Doctor and Somerset, whom he hoped, having less cause for regret, had found that repose which he sought in vain, he remained in bed. He longed for morning. Any change of situation seemed to his irritated nerves, better than the state in which he was in; and, with some gleams of pleasure, he watched the dawn break, and the sun rise behind the opposite hill. He got up and opened the window, and looking out, saw a man throw himself off a horse that was all in a foam, and enter the house. The next minute the clock struck eight.

Surprised at this circumstance, Thaddeus descended to the parlour, where he found the man; who, being Pembroke's messsenger, had returned express from the castle, bearing an order from Sir Robert (who was seized alarmingly ill) that his son should return immediately.

Dismayed to the soul with this new distress, Mr. Somerset gave the Count such a strain to his breast when he bade him farewell, as might have informed a more suspicious person, that it was intended for a final parting; but Thaddeus discerned nothing more in the anguish of his friend's countenance than fear for the safety of Sir Robert; and, fervently wishing his recovery, he bade Pembroke remember that should more assistance be necessary, Dr. Cavendish would remain at the Abbey till Lady Albina's return to the Wold.

Mr. Somerset being gone towards noon, when the Count was anxiously waiting the appearance of the physician from the room of his sister, he was surprised by the abrupt entrance of two gentlemen. He rose, and bowing, inquired what were their business? The elder of the men, with a swollen countenance, and in a voice of thunder, announced himself to be the Earl of Tinemouth, and the other as his son.

"We are come," continued he, standing at a haughty distance, "we are come, to carry from this nest of infamy, Lady Albina Stanhope, whom some one of her mother's paramours, perhaps you, Sir? dared to steal from her father's house yesterday evening. Tell me, if you do not wish to meet the chastisement due to your situation, where my daughter is?"

With difficulty the Count Sobieski could suppress the passions that were rising in his breast. He turned a scornful glance on the person of Lord Harwold, who, with an air of insufferable derision, was coolly measuring his figure through an eyeglass; and then replying to the Earl, said, in a firm voice; "My lord, whoever you suppose me to be, it matters not; I now stand in the place of Lady Tinemouth's executor; and, to my last gasp, I will prove myself the defender of her injured name."

"Her lover!" interrupted Lord Harwold, turning on his heel.

"Her defender, Sir," repeated Thaddeus, with a tremendous frown; "and shame and sorrow will pursue the son that requires a stranger to supply his duty."

"Wretch!" cried the Earl, forgetting his assumed loftiness, and advancing passionately towards Thaddeus, with his stick held up; "how dare you address such language to an English nobleman?"

"By the right of Nature, which holds her laws over all mankind;" returned he, calmly looking on the raised stick. "When an English nobleman forgets that he is a son, he is amenable to meet reproach from the meanest vassal he commands."

"You see, my lord," cried Harwold, sliding behind his father, "what we bring on ourselves by harbouring these democratic foreigners! Sir," added he, addressing himself to Thaddeus; "your dangerous principles shall be communicated to the Alien-office; such fellows ought to be hanged."

Sobieski eyed the enraged little lord with contempt; and, turning to the Earl, who was again opening his lips to speak, he said in an unaltered tone, "I cannot guess, Lord Tinemouth, what is the reason of this attack on me. I came here by mere accident; I found the Countess ill; and, from respect to her excellent qualities, I remained with her till her eyes were closed forever. She prayed to see her daughter before she died. What human heart could deny a mother such a request? and my friend, Pembroke Somerset, undertook to bring Lady Albina to the Abbey."

"Pembroke Somerset!" echoed the Earl, "A pretty guard for my daughter, truly! I make no doubt, he is just such a rascal as his father; just such another as yourself! I am not to be imposed on by your falsehoods; I know Lady Tinemouth to have been a disgrace to me; and you to be that German adventurer, on whose account I sent her from London."

Surprised at this unexpected calumny on the memory of a woman whose fame from any other mouth, came as unsullied as purity itself, Thaddeus gazed with horror at the furious countenance of the man whom he believed to be his father. His heart swelled, his temples throbbed; and, not deigning to reply to a charge as unmanly as it was false; he quietly took out of his pocket the two letters which the Countess had dictated to her husband and her son.

Lord Harwold tore his open, cast his eyes over the first words, then crumbling it up in his hands, threw it from him exclaiming, "I am not to be frightened either by her arts, or the lies of her fellows."

Thaddeus, no longer master of himself, sprung towards this unnatural son, and seizing his arm with the strength of a Hercules; "Lord Harwold!" cried he, in a dreadful voice, "If it were not that I have some mercy on you for that parent's sake, whom like a parricide you are giving a second death by such murderous slander, I would resent her wrongs at the hazard of your worthless life!"

"My lord! my lord!' cried the trembling Harwold, quaking under the gripe of Thaddeus, and shrinking from the terrible brightness of his eyes; "my lord! my lord, save me!"

The Earl, almost suffocated with rage, called out, "Ruffian! Let go my son!" and again raising his arm, aimed a blow at the head of Thaddeus, who, wrenching the stick out of the foaming lord's hand, snapped it in two, and threw the pieces out of the window.

Lord Harwold took this opportunity to ring the bell violently; on which summons, his own two servants entered the room.

"Now, you low-born, insolent scoundrel!" cried the disarmed Earl, stamping with his feet, and pointing to the men who stood in the door-way: "You shall be turned neck and heels out of this house. Richard, James, collar that fellow instantly."

Thaddeus only extended his arm to the men, (who were confusedly looking on each other,) and calmly said, "If either of you attempt to obey this command of your lord's, you shall have cause to repent it."

The men retreated. The Earl repeated his orders.

"Rascals! Do as I command you, or instantly prepare to be turned away. I will teach you," added he, clenching his fist at the Count, who stood resolutely and serenely before him, "I will teach you how to behave to a man of high birth!"

The footmen were again retarded from approaching, by a glance from the intimidating eyes of Thaddeus; who, turning with calm dignity to the storming Earl, "You can teach me nothing about high birth," said he, "that I do not already know. Could it be of any independent benefit to a man, then had not I received the taunts and insults which you have dared to cast upon me."

At that moment, Dr. Cavendish having heard a bustle made his appearance. Amazed at the sight of two strangers, whom from their enraged countenances, and the proud elevation with which Thaddeus was standing between them, he rightly judged to be the Earl and his son, he advanced towards his friend: intending to support him in the attack which he saw was menaced, by the violent gestures of his visitors.

"Dr. Cavendish," said Thaddeus, speaking to him as he approached, "your name must be a passport to the confidence of any man! I therefore shall gratify the husband of my ever lamented friend, by quitting this house; but I delegate you to the office with which she entrusted me. I leave you in charge of her sacred remains; and of the jewels, which you will find in her ladyship's room. She desired that half of them might be delivered, with her blessing, to her daughter; and the other half, with her pardon, to her son."

"Tell me, Dr. Cavendish," cried the Earl, as Thaddeus was passing him to leave the room; "Who is that insolent fellow? By heaven, he shall smart for this!"

"Aye, that he shall," added Lord Harwold; "If I have any interest with the Duke of Portland."

Dr. Cavendish, with a flushed cheek, was preparing to speak, when Thaddeus, turning round at this last threat of the Viscount, said, "If I did not feel myself as high above Lord Harwold, as heaven is from the earth, perhaps he might provoke me to treat him as he merits; but I spurn such resentment, and I despise him. For you, my lord," added he, addressing the Earl with an agitated countenance and voice, "there is an angel above, who pleads against the insults that you have obstinately heaped on an innocent man."

Thaddeus disappeared as he uttered the last word; and hastening from the house and park, stopped at a farmer's cottage near the brow of the hill. The owners of this humble little place, being the parents of one of Lady Tinemouth's maids, gladly welcomed the so highly praised Mr. Constantine, and offered him the command of their house, until he might find it convenient to quit the neighbourhood.

Any prospect of repose promised elysium to him: with harassed and torn nerves, he took possession of an apartment, which looked down upon the road that led from the Abbey to the town. The rapidity of the late events bewildered his senses like the illusions of a dream. He had seen his father, his brother, and his sister; and most probably he had parted from them forever! at least he hoped, that he should never again be tortured with the sight of Lord Tinemouth and his son.

"How!" thought he, whilst he walked up and down his solitary apartment, "how could the noble nature of my mother love such a man? And how could he have held so long an empire over the pure heart of the Countess."

Over and over again, he asked himself that question; but could return no answer; he could no where discern in the bloated features and passionate gestures of the Earl, any of that beauty of countenance, or grace of manners, which had charmed alike Therese Sobieski, and the tender Adeliza. Like those hideous chasms which are dug deep in the land by the impetuous sweep of a torrent, the course of violent passions leaves vast and irreparable traces on the soul. So it was with Lord Tinemouth.

"Gracious Providence!" ejaculated Thaddeus;—"How legibly does vice or virtue write itself on the countenance! The Earl's figure and features may be fine, but the lineaments of profligacy have degraded every part of him. Good God! Can he be my father! Can it be his blood that is now running in my veins? Can it be his blood that rises at this moment with detestation against him?"

Before the sun set, Thaddeus was aroused from these painful soliloques, by still more painful emotions; he saw from his window, a hearse driving at full gallop up the road which ascended to the Abbey, and presently return with a more solemn pace, followed by a post chaise and the Earl's coach.

"Unfeeling wretches!" cried Thaddeus, leaning out of the window, and pursuing with his eye, the tips of the sable plumes, as the cavalcade wound round the road; "Could ye not allow this poor corse a little rest? Must her injuries be extended to the grave? Must her cold relics be insulted, be hurried to the tomb, without reverence, without decency?"

The noble heart of Thaddeus distended, beat, and writhed with horror, at this climax of the Earl's barbarity. Dr. Cavendish entered; he began to speak of the perpetrators of an act, which he deemed sacrilege against the dead; but Thaddeus could not bear it; and he interrupted him by inquiring how Lady Albina had borne such brutal treatment of her mother's remains.

"Very ill," returned the Doctor; "and though I warned the Earl, that to compel her ladyship to follow the hearse, would be at the imminent peril of her life, yet he would not be softened. He put her into the coach in a state of insensibility, with no other assistant than a woman servant, who received her into her arms; and then, loaded with the secret curses of every honest heart, I saw him set off in the post chaise which was already occupied by his detestable son. Heaven's malediction must follow them!"

The Doctor pursued the subject. Sobieski's wearied spirits listened to him with patience; for nothing could now be said to increase an abhorrence which had gained its height. He avowed to himself that he hated the Earl; and he hearkened in gloomy silence to the new crimes recounted by his friend.

In the midst of this depressing conversation, a courier arrived from Dr. Cavendish's Stamford patient, desiring that he would return immediately: the gentleman having sustained a relapse. Cavendish, with some reluctance to quit the Count, (whom he still knew by no other name than Constantine,) ordered the chaise to the door. He shook hands with Thaddeus, requesting he would let him hear from him, and bidding him many affectionate adieus, looked out of the carriage window, till the faint light of the moon, and the fading glimmer of the cottage candles, failed to make the little spot which contained his friend, even discernable.

CHAPTER XXX.

For the first time, during many nights, Thaddeus slept soundly; but his dreams were disturbed; and he awoke from them at an early hour unrefreshed, and in much fever.

The simple breakfast which his cottage host and hostess set before him, was hardly touched. Their nicely dressed dinner met with the same fate. He was ill, and neither possessed appetite nor spirits to eat. The good people being too civil to intrude upon him, he sat alone in his window from eight o'clock, (at which time he had arisen,) till the cawing of the rooks, as they returned to the Abbey woods, reminded him that evening was coming on. He was uneasy at the absence of Somerset; not so much on his own account, as on that of Sir Robert, whose increased danger might have occasioned this delay; however he hoped otherwise. Longing earnestly for a temporary asylum under the roof of his friend, he trusted that the sympathy of Pembroke would heal all his wounds, and fit him (if it were required) yet farther to brave the buffets of adverse fortune. Nor was Miss Beaufort forgotten. If ever one idea more than another sweetened the bitterness of his reflections, it was the remembrance of the lovely Mary. Whenever her image rose before him, whether standing with folded arms and looking with vacant gaze on the valley beneath; or, when cast upon his watchful pillow, he opened his aching eyes to the morning light; still, as her beautiful figure presented itself to his mind, he sighed; but it was a sigh laden with balm; it did not tear his breast like those which were wrung from him by the hard hand of calamity and insult; it was the soft breath of love, which makes man dream of heaven, whilst it betrays him to the grave. Thaddeus thought it delightful to recollect how she had looked on him; it was happiness to know that he owed his liberty to her: and the anticipation, that he should again draw bliss from her eyes, swelled, agitated, and intoxicated his soul.

"Sweet Mary!" murmured he, "I shall see thee once more! I shall again experience thy kindness! I will thank thee with my heart; and think myself blest in being allowed the privilege of loving thee in silence, and for ever."

The sight of Pembroke riding through the farmer's fields towards the cottage, agreeably recalled the wandering mind of Sobieski. He went out to meet him; Mr. Somerset, putting his horse on a gallop, was at his friend's side, and had alighted, before he could cross the first meadow. Thaddeus, immediately inquired after the Baronet's health. Pembroke answered the question with an incoherence that filled him with surprise. They walked towards the house, but he did not seem to recover himself; his absence of mind, and the wild rambling of his eyes whenever he was spoken to, were so striking, that the Count entertained no doubt of some dreadful accident.

As soon as they entered the little parlour, Pembroke threw himself into a chair, and throwing off his hat, wiped the perspiration from his face, which, though a cold November evening, was streaming down his forehead. Thaddeus felt suspense too painful to be endured.

"What is the matter, dear Pembroke? Is Miss Beaufort well?"

"Perfectly," returned he; "Every body is well, except myself and my father, who, I verily believe, has lost his senses; at any rate, he will drive me mad."

The manner in which this reply was uttered, astonished Thaddeus so much, that he could only gaze on the convulsed features of his friend with wonder. Pembroke observed the amazement which sat in his eyes, and laying his hand on his arm; "My dear, dear Sobieski!" said he, "What do I not owe you? Good Heaven, how humble do I feel myself in your sight! But there is a power above, who knows how intimately you are woven with every artery in this heart!"

"I believe it, my dear Pembroke," cried Thaddeus, yet more alarmed than before; "Tell me what it is that distresses you; if my counsel, or my sympathy, can offer any thing to comfort and assist you, you know that I am your own."

Pembroke burst into tears, and covering his streaming eyes with his handkerchief exclaimed, "I am indeed distressed! distressed beyond your comfort. Oh! how can I speak it! You will despise my father, Thaddeus! You will spurn me!"

"Impossible!" cried he, with energy; though his flushed cheek and fainting heart immediately declared that he had anticipated what he must hear.

"I see," cried Pembroke, regarding the altered features of his friend with a glance of agony; "I see that you think it is possible, that my father can sink me below my own contempt."

Thaddeus felt the benumbing touch of ingratitude run through his veins; his frame was chilled, was petrified; but his just affection, and calmed countenance, proclaimed how true a judgment he had passed on the whole. He took the burning hand of Mr. Somerset in his own, and, with a steady and consoling voice, said, "Assure yourself, dear Pembroke, whatever be the commands of your father, I shall adhere to them. I can understand by these generous emotions, that he objects to receive me as your friend. Perhaps," added he, a gloom of suspicion flashing through his mind; "perhaps Miss Beaufort may have perceived the devotedness of my heart, and disdaining my——"

"Hush, for Heaven's sake!" cried Pembroke, starting from his chair; "do not implicate my poor cousin! Do not add to her disappointment the misery that you suspect her; no Thaddeus," continued he, in a calmer tone, "Mary Beaufort loves you: she confessed it in an agony of grief on my bosom, just before I came away; and only through her, dare I ever expect to meet forgiveness from you. In spite of my father you may marry her. She has no curse to dread: she need not sacrifice all that is most precious in her sight, to the obstinate caprice of criminal resentment!"

"A curse!" reiterated Thaddeus, "How is this? What have I done to deserve such hatred from your father?"

"O nothing;" cried Pembroke, "nothing. My father never saw you. My father thanks you for all that you have done for me; but it is your country that he hates. Some Polander, years back, injured him; and my father took a fatal oath against the whole nation. He declares he cannot, he will not break it, were he by so doing to save his own life, or even mine; for (Heaven forgive me!) I was this morning wrought up to such a pitch of phrenzy, that I threatened to destroy myself, rather than sacrifice my gratitude and honour to his cruel commands! Nay, to convince you that this is no personal enmity to yourself, he ordered me to give you writings which will put you in possession of five hundred a year for ever. I have them with me."

All the pride of the princely house rose at once in the breast of Thaddeus. Though full of indignation at this insult of Sir Robert, he regarded the averted face of his friend with compassion, whilst in a firm voice he rejected the degrading compromise.

"Tell your father," added he, addressing Pembroke in a tone, which, even his affection could not soften from a command; "that my absence is not to be bought with money, nor my friendship so rewarded."

Pembroke covered his burning face with his hands. This sight at once brought down the haughty spirit of the Count, who continued in gentler accents; "Whatever be the sentiments of Sir Robert Somerset, they shall meet with due attention from me. He is your father, therefore I respect him; but he has put it out of his power to oblige me; I cannot accept his bounty. Though your heart, my dearest Pembroke, is above all price, yet I will make it a sacrifice to your duty."—And by so doing put the last seal on my misfortunes! was the meaning of the heavy sigh which accompanied his last words.

Pembroke traversed the room in an agony. "Merciful Providence!" cried he, wringing his clapsed hands, "direct me! O Thaddeus if you could read my tortured heart, you would pity me; you would see that this business is tearing my soul from my body. What am I to do? I cannot, I will not part with you for ever."

The Count went up to him, and drew him to a seat; "Be satisfied," said he, "that I am convinced of your affection. Whatever may happen, this assurance will be sufficient to give me comfort; therefore I intreat you, dear Pembroke, by that affection, not to bring regret to me, and reproach to yourself, by disobeying the will of your father! If we separate for life, remember, my beloved friend, that the span of our existence here is short; we shall meet again in a happier world, perhaps more blest, for having immolated our wishes to hard duty in this."

"Cease, Sobieski, cease!" cried Pembroke, "I can draw no consolation from this reasoning. It is not duty to obey a hatred little short of distraction; and if we now separate, I know I shall never feel peace more. Good Heaven! what comfort can I find, when I know that you are exposed to all the indignities which the world levels against the unfortunate? Can I indulge in the luxuries of my father's house, when I know you have neither a home nor subsistence? No, Thaddeus, I am not such a villain. I will not give you up, though my father should load me with curses; I trust there is a just power above, that would avert them."

Perceiving that argument, at this time, would not only be fruitless, but probably increase his friend's irritated nature to the commission of some rash action, Thaddeus pretended to overlook the frantic gesture and voice which terminated this speech; and assuming a serene air, he replied; "Let this be the subject of future conversations. At present I must conjure you, by the happiness of us both, to return to the castle. You know my message to Sir Robert. Present my respects to your aunt; and," added he, after a pause, "assure Miss Beaufort, that whilst I have life, her goodness will be its most animating principle."

Pembroke interupted him. "Why these messages, dear Thaddeus! Do not suppose, that if I fulfil my father's order to return to Somerset to-night, that it is our separation. Gracious Heaven! is it so easy a matter to part for ever?"

"Not for ever! O no;" replied Thaddeus, grasping his hand; "we shall see each other again; only, meanwhile, repeat those messages to your aunt and cousin. Go, my dear Pembroke, to your father; and may the Lord of heaven bless you!"

The last words were spoken in almost a stifled voice, as he opened his arms and strained his friend to his breast.

"I shall see you to-morrow!" cried Pembroke, "on no other condition I leave you now."

Thaddeus made no other answer to this demand, (which he determined should never be granted,) than a second embrace. Pembroke went out of the room, to order his horses; then returning again, he stood in the door-way, and holding out his hand to the Count, said, "Farewell, till to-morrow." Thaddeus shook it warmly, and he disappeared.

When the outward door closed after his friend, the Count remained in the seat into which he had thrown himself. He did not venture to move, lest he should by chance catch a glance of Pembroke from the window. Now that he was gone he felt the full worth of what he had relinquished. He had resigned a man who loved him: one who had known and revered his ever-lamented grandfather and his mother; the only one with whom he could have discoursed of their virtues! He felt that he had severed from him the link which had united his present state with his former fortunes; and throwing his arms along a table that stood near him, he leaned his aching head upon them, and, in idea, followed, with an anguished heart, the progress and reception of his friend at the Castle.

The racking misery which tortured the mind of Mr. Somerset, was not borne with equal resignation. Conscious of having inflicted fresh wounds on the breast of his noble friend, his spirits were so ill adapted to society, that he felt rather pleased than disappointed, when he found the supper-room at the Castle quite vacant, and only one cover on the table awaiting his arrival.

He asked a few questions of the servants, who informed him that it was already late, past twelve o'clock, and that Sir Robert, who was taken worse, had retired to bed early in the evening.

"And where are my aunt and cousin?" demanded Pembroke.

One of them replied, that in consequence of Miss Beaufort having been suddenly indisposed, both the ladies had left the supper-room before eleven. Pembroke readily guessed the cause of this disorder; he too truly adjudged it to Mary's extreme anxiety respecting the reception which Count Sobieski would give to his disgraceful errand; and, sighing bitterly, he said no more, but went instantly to his chamber.

The restless state of his mind awoke Mr. Somerset by times. Full of solicitude for the success of an application which he intended to make to Miss Beaufort, he traversed the terrace for an hour before he was summoned to breakfast. The Baronet continuing unwell, the ladies only were in the room when he entered. Miss Dorothy, who had learnt the particulars of the late events from the agitated Mary, longed to ask Pembroke how his friend would act on her brother's command; but every time that she moved her lips, his inflamed eye and wan countenance made her stop, and fear to venture on the subject. Mary sat in mute dejection, watching the hurried actions of her cousin; and when, after he had swallowed a basin of tea, he rose up, and took up his hat to leave the room, she looked anxiously towards him. Pembroke turned round at the same moment, and holding out his hand to her, said, "Come, Mary; I want to say something to you. Will you walk with me on the terrace?"

Miss Beaufort, with trepidation and a beating heart, took his arm, and proceeded in silence till they reached the gravel walk. A mutual and deep-drawn sigh, was the first opening of a conversation, on which the souls of both hung with interest, hope and dread. Pembroke was the first who began.

"My dear, dear Mary," said, he "you are now my sole dependence. From what I told you yesterday of my father's stubborn inflexibility, we can have no hope of his relenting; indeed, after what has passed, I could not flatter myself that Thaddeus Sobieski would on any account submit to an obligation at his hands. Already he has refused with all the indignation I expected, Sir Robert's offer of an annuity. My dear cousin, how can I exist, and yet witness this noble friend in distress, and living without the succour of my friendship? Heaven knows this must be the case; for I would sooner perish then venture to insult the man whom my father has treated so ill, with any pecuniary offers from me! Therefore, dear Mary, it is on you alone that I depend. Thaddeus adores you, and you love him. Marry him, my beloved cousin," cried he, catching her hand to his lips "and relieve my heart from a load of shame and misery! Be generous, my sweet Mary," added he, supporting her now trembling frame against his breast; "Act up to your noble nature, and offer him by me, that hand which his calamities and disinterestedness preclude him from requesting."

Miss Beaufort, hardly able to articulate from the emotions that choaked her utterance, replied, "I would give him all that I possess could it purchase him one tranquil hour; I would serve him for ever, could I do it and be unknown; but——"

"O do not hesitate! Do not doubt!" interrupted Pembroke, "To serve your friends, I know that you are capable of the most extraordinary exertions; I know that there is nothing within the verge of possibility, that your generous disposition would not attempt; then, my beloved Mary, dare to be what you are; by having the magnanimity to act as you know you ought; by offering your hand to him, show the noble Sobieski that you really deserve the devotion of a hero's heart."

"Dear Pembroke," replied Mary, wiping the still gliding tears from her burning cheek, "after the confession which you drew from me yesterday, I will not deny, that to possess the esteem of your friend would render me the happiest of created beings; but I cannot believe what your sanguine affection tells me; I cannot suppose, situated as I was at Lady Dundas's under a cloud of fashion, and surrounded by frivolous and contemptible society, that he should discover any thing in me to respect; every way embarrassed as I was, disliking my companions, afraid of my own interest in him, a veil was drawn over my mind, through which he could neither judge of my good or my bad qualities: how then can I flatter myself, or do the Count Sobieski such an injury, as to imagine that he could feel any preference to such an insignificant character as I must have appeared?"

It was some time before Pembroke could shake the hold which this prepossession had taken of Miss Beaufort's mind. After having set in every possible light the terms with which his friend had spoken of her name, he at length convinced her of what her heart so earnestly wished to believe, that she was not entirely indifferent to Sobieski.

Mr. Somerset's next achievement was to overcome her scruples against commissioning him with the message he was desirous to communicate to Thaddeus. Owing to the continual recurrence of her fears, that the warmth of her cousin might have too highly coloured the first object of debate, this task was not more easy to accomplish than the former. In vain she remonstrated, in vain she doubted, in vain demurred; Pembroke would not be denied; and as with faultering lips, she assented to the permission which he had almost extorted; she threw her arms round his neck, and implored him to be careful of her honour; to remember that she had put into his charge all that was most precious to her, the modesty of her sex, and her own delicacy.

Pembroke, delighted at this consent, notwithstanding he received it through the medium of many heavy tears, embraced his cousin with ten thousand animating promises of future happiness; and having allowed her to enter the house, mounted his horse, and set off on the full gallop, towards Harrowby-Hill.

CHAPTER XXXI.

When Thaddeus recovered from the reverie into which he had been thrown by the departure of Mr. Somerset, he considered how he might remove out of a country wherein he had only met with, and occasioned distress.

The horrid price which Pembroke's father had set on the continuance of their friendship rendered it necessary that his flight should be immediate. Averse to a second interview with his friend, which could only produce them pain, he determined that not another morn should rise upon him in Lincolnshire; and taking a pen, with all the future loneliness of his fate painted on his heart, he wrote two letters.

One he addressed to Mr. Somerset, bidding him that farewell, which he confessed he could never have taken. As he wrote, his hand trembled, his bosom swelled, and he hastily his eyelids to withhold his tears from showing themselves e paper: his emotion, his grief, were driven back, were aled; but the tenderness of his soul flowed over the

. He forgave Pembroke's father, for Pembroke's sake;
n spite of their personal disunion, he vowed that no
y consideration should restrain his love from following eps of his friend, even into the regions of eternity. He his melancholy epistle, with informing Mr. Somerset, as he should quit England immediately, any search after which his generous nature might dictate, would be in ough Thaddeus Sobieski would have disdained a life of dence on the greatest potentate in the world, though he d with the same sincerity, a similar proposal from his

, and despised the degrading offer of Sir Robert; yet he o disparagement to his dignity, no infringement on the erested nature of his friendship, when he accepted, and ed to retain, the money which Pembroke had conveyed n in prison. Thaddeus never acted but from principle.
onourable and penetrating mind knew exactly at what to draw the tender thread of delicacy. Pride and ndence, with him, were distinct terms. Receiving assisfrom a friend, and leaning on him wholly for support, different meaning: he accepted the first with gratitude:
uld have thought it impossible to live and endure the last.
ese premises, Pembroke was never pained by an attempt urn his bounty. Indeed Thaddeus would have con-l himself unworthy to confer a benefit, if he had not n how to receive one. This spirit left no part of Miss ort's obligation on his mind, but its sweetness; and with impressions, and a throbbing heart, he began a short s to her.

"To Miss Beaufort.

y faculties seem to lose their power, when I take up my address for the first and the last time, Miss Beaufort. I know what I would say—what I ought; I dare not ē to write all that I feel. But have you not been my ctress? Did you not assert my character, and give me
, when I was calumniated and in distress? Did you not ne from the scorn of unpitying folly? Did you not cone with your own compassion? You have done all this; rely you will not despise the gratitude of a heart which ave condescended to soothe and to comfort? At least, I cannot leave England for ever without imploring blessings on the head of Miss Beaufort; without thanking her on my knees, on which I am writing, for that gracious and benign spirit, which discovered a breaking heart under the mask of serenity; which penetrated through the garb of poverty and dependence, and saw that the contemned Constantine was not what he seemed! Your smiles, Miss Beaufort; your voice, speaking commiseration, were my sweetest consolations during those heavy months of sorrow, which I endured at Dundas house: I contemplated you as a pitying angel, sent to reconcile me to a life which had already become a burden. These are the benefits which Miss Beaufort has bestowed on a friendless exile; these are the benefits which she has bestowed on me! and they are written on my soul. Not till I go down into the grave shall they be forgotten. Oh! not even then, for when I rise again, I shall still find them registered there!

"Farewell, most respected, most dear Miss Beaufort. May the Father of heaven bless, with his choicest care, her, whose name shall ever be the first in the prayers of her most grateful, and most devoted servant,

"THADDEUS CONSTANTINE SOBIESKI.

"Harrowby-Hill,
"11 o'clock at night."

When he had finished this epistle, with a paralyzed hand he enclosed it in the envelop which contained Somerset's; then writing a few lines to the good old farmer, he begged him to accept the note which they contained, as a small compensation for his great hospitality; and having sealed both packets, he disposed them so on the table, that they might be the first things seen on entering the room.

It now being midnight, he thought it high time to set out on his dismal journey. Having tied some linen in a grey silk handkerchief, which had formerly been wraped round his neck by Lady Sara, one wet evening in Grosvenor-Place; he put all his remaining money into his pocket. It did not exceed thirty pounds; the rest having been expended on his way to the Abbey, and defraying little expenses attending the illness of the Countess, to which her purse (ever kept low by the tardiness of the Earl's payments) was not prepared to answer. However, as he was determined to walk to London, where he would embark for America, he hoped it would at least hold out, until he had landed on a shore, from whence he trusted never to return.

"Ah!" cried he, as he gently closed the window by which he leaped into the little garden. "What accumulated sins, O Russia, will be heaped on thy head! Every hasty sigh that rebels in my breast against the Almighty hand which is again driving me out a wanderer on the wide world, calls vengeance upon thee! How many, wretched country!" added he, resting on the bar of the outward gate; "how many hast thou driven from their homes! how many hast thou made vagabonds and murderers, for that scanty pittance, of which, with remorseless and wanton gripe, they were deprived by thee!—Oh, righteous Power of justice and mercy!" cried he, stretching his arms towards that heaven, over which the piercing winds of a bleak October night were scattering the thick and pillowy clouds; 'grant me fortitude to bear with resignation to thy will, the miseries that I may yet have to encounter. Oh!" added he, his heart melting as the idea presented itself! "teach me to forget what I have been! Teach me to forget that on this dreadful night, last year, I clasped the dying body of my grandfather in these arms!"

He could not speak further; but leaning his pale face against the gate, remained for a few minutes dissolved in anguished recollection: then recovering himself by a sudden start, he proceeded with hasty steps through the different meadows, till they conducted him into the high road.

It was on the tenth of October, 1795, that the Count Sobieski commenced his lonely and melancholy journey. It was on the tenth of October, 1794, that he found the Palatine bleeding to death in the midst of a heap of slain. The coincidence of his present feelings with those of a twelve month past, powerfully affected Thaddeus; they recalled to him remembrances in their most vivid colours, which time, and the many intermediate events, had considerably softened.

Distressed by these painful scenes, which memory, ever true to her nature, raised before his mind's eye in rapid and long succession; he quickened his pace; he slackened it; he quickened it again; but nothing could rid him of those tormenting images, which seemed to glide around him like visible spirits of the departed.

When the dawn broke, and the sun rose, he found himself advanced several miles on the south side of Ponton Hill. The spiry aisles of Harrowby Abbey were discernible through the mist; and the towers of Somerset Castle, from their height and situation, were as distinctly seen as if he had been at their base. Neither of these were objects calculated to raise the spirits of Thaddeus. The sorrows of the Countess, whose eyes had so recently closed; and the treatment he afterwards received from the man to whom he owed his life, were recollections which made him turn away from the Abbey with a pang, and fix his eyes on Somerset. He looked towards its ivied head with all the regret, and all the tenderness which can overflow a human heart: under that roof, he believed the eyes of his adored Mary were sealed in sleep; and in an instant his agitated soul addressed her as if she had been present.

"Farewell, most lovely, most beloved! The conviction, that I resign even the hope of ever again beholding thee, to the peace of my friend, shall give me comfort, when I am drawing my breath in a far, far distant world."

In this way, thus communing with own troubled spirit, he walked on the whole day on his way to London. Totally absorbed in meditation, he did not remark the gaze of curiosity which followed his elegant and distressed figure; as he passed through the different towns and villages. Pondering on the past, the present, and the future, he neither felt hunger nor thirst; but, with a fixed eye and abstracted countenance, pursued his route, till night and weariness overtook him in the midst of the high road, far from any house.

Thaddeus looked around and above: the sky was clear and glittering with stars; the moon shining on a near branch of the Ouse, which divides Huntingdonshire from Cambridgeshire, lit the green heath which skirted its banks. Thaddeus wished not for a more magnificent canopy; and placing his wallet under his head, lay down beneath a hillock of furze and broom, and slept till morning.

When he awoke from a sleep, which fatigue and fasting had rendered more torpid than refreshing, he found that the splendours of night had been succeeded by a heavy rain; and that he was drenched through. He rose up with a stiffness in his limbs, a pain in his head, and a dimness over his eyes, which almost disabled him from moving. He readily judged that he had taken cold: and every moment feeling himself grow worse, he thought it necessary to seek some house, where he might purchase rest and assistance.

To this end, leaning on his stick, but no longer able to incumber himself with even the light load of his bundle, he threw it among the brambles: believing from the symptoms which he felt, that he had not many hours to endure the ills of life, he staggered a few yards farther: no habitation appeared in sight; his limbs became more feeble; his eyes seemed totally obscured, and he sunk down on a bank. For a minute he attempted to struggle with the cold grasp of death, which he believed was fastening on his heart.

"And are my days to be so short! Are they to end thus?" thought he; "Merciful Providence, pardon my repining!"

These were the last movements of the lips of Thaddeus, whilst his blood seemed freezing to insensibility. His eyes closed, his head fell back; and pale and without animation, he lay at the foot of the tree near which he had dropt.

The Count had been a quarter of an hour in this deathlike state, when a gentleman, who was passing that road in his way to a country seat in Cambridgeshire, thought he perceived a man lying among the nettles and grass a little onwards on the heath. The traveller immediately stopped his carriage, and ordering one of the outriders to alight, bade him examine whether the object he saw were living or dead.

The man obeyed; and presently returning with an affrighted countenance informed his master, that it was the body of a man, who, by his dress, appeared to be a gentleman, and who, being quite senseless, he supposed had been murdered by robbers. The features of the benevolent stranger immediately reflected the hue of his servant's; but ordering the chariot door to be opened, he took in his hand a bottle of drops (which from his own invalid state, was his travelling companion) and alighting, he hastened to the side of the lifeless Thaddeus.

By this time, all the servants were collected round the spot; and the good man himself, whilst he gazed with pity on the marble features of the Count, observed with pleasure, that he saw no marks of violence. Supposing that the present accident might have been occasioned by a fit; and considering it possible by proper means to recal life: he desired that the unfortunate person's waistcoat might be unclosed; and taking off his hat, he contrived to pour some drops into his mouth. Their warmth appeared to have renewed pulsation in the heart; for one of the servants, who was stooping declared that it beat under his hand. When the benevolent gentleman convinced himself that this report was true, he ordered his servants to place the poor traveller in his carriage; having only another mile to go before he reached Deerhurst, he said he hoped that his charge might be restored at the end of their destination.

Whilst the postillion drove in full gallop towards the house, the cold face of Thaddeus rested on the bosom of the stranger, who continued to chafe his temples with lavender-water till the chariot stopped before the gates. Two men carried the Count to the house; and having left him with their master, and a medical man who resided near, other restoratives were applied, which succeeded in recalling his wandered senses. When he had completely recovered his powers, and was able to look round and distinguish objects, he saw that he was supported by two gentlemen, and in a magnificent bed-chamber.

Gratitude, it may be said, was the first-born feeling in the soul of Thaddeus. In the moment of his revival from that sleep into which he believed he had fallen, till time should be lost in eternity, he pressed the hands of them who held his; not doubting but that they were the good Samaritans who had preserved him from perishing.

The younger of the gentlemen, perceiving by the animated lustre which spread over his patient's eyes, that he was going to speak, put his hand on his lips, and said, "Pardon me, Sir! you must not speak. Your life, at present hangs upon a thread; the slightest exertion would snap it: but, as all you want is rest and resuscitation, to supply some great expense which the vital powers have sustained, I must require that you neither speak, nor be spoken to, till I give permission. Meanwhile, be satisfied, Sir, that you are in the most honourable hands. This gentleman," added he, pointing to his friend, "saw you on the heath, and brought you to his house, where you now are."

Thaddeus bowed his head to them both in sign of gratitude and compliance; and the elder left the room.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Next morning, when the seal was taken off the lips of Thaddeus, he expressed in the most animated terms, his deep sense of the humanity which had actuated both the gentlemen to take such generous interest in his fate.

"You owe no thanks to me," replied the one who had enjoined and released him from silence, and who was alone with him; I am only the agent of another. Yet I do not deny, that in obeying the benevolence of Sir Robert Somerset, I have frequent opportunities of gratifying my own heart."

Thaddeus was so confounded at this discovery that he could not speak, and the gentleman proceeded.

"I am apothecary to Sir Robert's household; and, as my excellent master has been long afflicted with an ill state of health, I live in a small lodge at the other end of the park. He is the best man in all the country; nay, I believe I may say, the most benevolent in the kingdom; and should he die, (which the late melancholy fits too fearfully threaten,) both poor and rich would lose their friend. Sad and ill as he was this morning, when I told him you were out of danger, he expressed a pleasure only known to the truly humane."

Thaddeus, not considering the wildness of the question, hastily demanded, "Does he know who I am?"

The honest apothecary started at the look and tone of voice with which these words were delivered, and then replied, "No; is there any reason, Sir, to make you wish that he should not?"

"Certainly none:" replied Thaddeus, recollecting himself, and sighing: "and I shall be impatient till I have an opportunity of telling him how grateful I am for the goodness which he has shown to me as a stranger."

The apothecary, surprised at these hints, (which the Count not considering their tendency, allowed to escape,) gathered sufficient from them, united with the speaker's superior mien, to make him suppose that his patient was some emigrant of quality, whom Sir Robert would rejoice in having served. These surmises and conclusions having passed very quickly through the honest gentleman's brain, he bowed his head with that respect, which the generous mind is proud to pay to nobility in ruins: and resumed,

"Whatever you may be, Sir, a peasant or a prince, you will meet with every hospitality from the noble owner of this house. His spirit is equal in magnificence with the goodness of his heart; Deerhurst will be rendered as comfortable to you, as great benevolence and great wealth can bestow; and I am certain, that Sir Robert will consider the dreadful apoplexy, that brought him from Somerset for change of air, rather fortunate than otherwise, as it has afforded him an opportunity of serving and knowing you."

Thaddeus blushed at the strain of this speech; and readily understanding what was passing in the mind of the apothecary, hardly knew how to reply. He paused for a moment, and then said, "All that you have declared, Sir, in praise of Sir Robert Somerset, I cannot have a doubt of his deserving. I have already felt the effects of his humanity, and shall ever remember that my life was prolonged by his means; but I have no pretensions to the honour of his acquaintance. I only wish to see him, that I may thank him for what he has done; therefore, if you will permit me to rise this evening, instead of to-morrow morning, you will oblige me."

To this request, the apothecary gave a respectful, yet firm denial; and descended to communicate his observations to his patron.

The anxiety which agitated the Count's mind, when he reflected that he was receiving all these obligations from his most implacable enemy, so occupied and disturbed him, that he passed a sleepless night. The dawn found his fever much augmented; but no corporeal sufferings could persuade him to abandon a resolution of seeing the Baronet, and immediately leaving his house; believing, as he did, that all this kindness would have been withheld, had his host known on whom he was pouring such benefits, he felt as if every minute which saw him under Sir Robert's roof, inflicted a new outrage on his own dignity and honour.

To this end then, as soon as Mr. Middleton, the apothecary, had retired to breakfast, Thaddeus rose from his bed, and was completely dressed before he returned. The good man expostulated on the rashness of what he had done, and argued no less than a relapse from the morning symptoms of his patient. Thaddeus once in his life was obstinate, though civilly so; and begging a servant to request Sir Robert to indulge him with an audience for a few minutes alone in his library, he soon convinced Mr. Middleton that his purpose was not to be shaken.

The Baronet returning his compliments, that he should be happy to see his guest, the still anxious apothecary offered him his assistance down the stairs. Thaddeus needed no help, and gratefully declined it. The exertion necessary to be summoned for the interview, had imparted as much momentary strength to his frame as to his mind; and though his colour was heightened, he entered the library with a firm step.

Sir Robert met him at the door, and shaking him by the hand, with many warm assurances of pleasure at his recovery, would have led him to a seat; but Thaddeus drawing back, only supported himself against the back of it with his hand; whilst in a steady voice, he expressed the most animated thanks for the benefits he had received; then pausing, and casting the proud lustre of his eyes to the ground, lest their anguage should tell all that he thought, he continued, "I have only to regret, Sir Robert, that your benevolence has been lavished on a man whom you regard with abhorrence. I am that Count Sobieski, that Polander, whom you commanded your son to see no more. Respecting even the prejudices of my friend's parent, I was hastening to London, meaning to set sail for America with the first ship, when I swooned on the road. I believe I was nearly expiring; your humanity saved me; and I now owe to gratitude, as well as to my own satisfaction, the fulfilment of my declaration. I shall leave Deerhurst immediately; and England, as soon as I am able to embark."

Thaddeus, with a second bow, and not quite so firm a step, without venturing a glance at what he supposed were the shamed looks of the Baronet, was preparing to quit the room, when Sir Robert, with a pale and aghast countenance, exclaimed "Stop!"

Thaddeus looked at him with wonder. The Baronet, incapable of saying more, pointed to a chair for him to sit down; then sinking into another himself, took out his handkerchief, and wiping away the large drops that stood on his forehead, breathlessly panted for respiration. At last, with a desperate kind of haste, he said;

"Was your mother, Therese Sobieski?"

Thaddeus, still more astonished, replied in the affirmative; and Sir Robert threw himself back on the chair with a deep groan. Hardly knowing what he did, the Count rose from his seat, and advanced towards him; Sir Robert hearing his approach, stretched out his hand, and, with a look of agony, asked who was his father? then, without waiting for a reply, hid his convulsed features beneath his handkerchief. The Baronet's agitation, which now shook him like an earthquake, had become contagious: Thaddeus gazed at him with a palsying uncertainty working at his heart: and, laying his hand upon his bewildered brain, he answered: "I know not. I believe the Earl of Tinemouth. But here is his picture." With a trembling hand he took the case which held it, out of his pocket; and tearing open the clasps, gave it to Sir Robert, who had started from his position at the name of the Earl. The moment the Baronet's eyes rested on the miniature, he threw it from him, and fell senseless back on the chair.

Thaddeus, hardly more alive, sprinkled some water on his face, and with throbbing temples and a beating heart, stood in wordless expectation over him. Such excessive emotion told him, that something more than Sir Robert's hatred of the Polanders had stimulated his late conduct; and too earnest for an explanation, to ring for assistance, he rejoiced to see by the convulsion of the Baronet's features, and the heaving of his chest, that animation was returning. In a few minutes he opened his eyes, but when he met the anxious gaze of Thaddeus, he closed them as suddenly, and rising from his seat, staggered up against the chimney-piece, exclaiming, "O God, direct me!"

Thaddeus, whose conjectures were now wrought almost to wildness, followed him, and whilst his exhausted frame seemed ready to sink to the earth, implored him to speak.

"O, Sir!" cried he, "If you know any thing about my family? If you know any thing about my father, in pity answer me! Or, only tell me; am I so wretched as to be the son of Lord Tinemouth?"

The violence of the Count's emotions, during this agonizing petition, totally overcame him; before he had finished speaking his limbs withdrew their support; and sinking down on his knees, his head dropped breathless against the side of a chair; though incapable of standing, his beseeching and eager eyes were riveted on the Baronet's averted face.

Sir Robert turned hastily round. He saw him sunk, like a beautiful flower, bruised and trampled on by the wanton foot of him who had given it root; unable to make any evasive reply to this last appeal of virtue and of nature, he threw himself with a burst of tears upon his neck, and exclaimed, "Wretch that I have been! O, Sobieski! I am thy father. Dear, injured son of the unhappy Therese!"

The first words which carried this avowal to the heart of Thaddeus, deprived it of motion, and when Sir Robert expected to receive the returning embrace of his son, he found him senseless in his arms.

The cries of the Baronet brought Mr. Middleton and the servants into the room. When the former saw the state of the Count, and perceiving the agonized position of his patron (who was supporting and leaning over his son) the honest man declared, that he expected nothing less from the gentleman's disobedience of his orders. The presence of the servants having recalled Sir Robert's wandering faculties, he desired them to remove Thaddeus to his chamber. Then following them in silence, when they had laid their charge on the bed, he watched in extreme, but concealed anxiety, till Mr. Middleton, by opening a vein, again brought back animation to his patient.

The moment the Count unclosed his eyes, they fixed themselves on the agitated father. He drew the hand that held his to his lips. The tears of paternal love again bathed the cheeks of Sir Robert; he felt how warm at his heart was the affection of his deserted son (and making a sign for Mr. Middleton to leave the room, who obeyed) he bent his streaming eyes upon the other hand of Thaddeus, and said in a faultering voice, "Can you pardon me!"

Thaddeus threw himself on his father's bosom, and wept profusely; then raising Sir Robert's clapsed hands in his, whilst his eloquent eyes seemed to search the heavens, he said, "My dear, dear mother loved you to her latest hour; and I have all my mother's heart; whatever may have been your faults, I feel that I love my father."

Sir Robert strained him to his breast. After a pause, whilst he shook the tears from his silver lashes, he resumed, "Certain, my dear son, that you require repose, and assured that you will not find it till I have offered some apology for my unnatural conduct, I will now explain the various circumstances which impelled my actions, and drew distress upon the noble creature, your mother."

Sir Robert hesitated a moment, that he might recover breath, and then went on.

"Keep your situation;" added he, putting down Thaddeus, who, at this opening was raising himself up; "I shall tell my melancholy story with less pain, if your eyes be not upon me. I will begin from the first."

The Baronet proceeded to say; that very early in life, he had attached himself to Miss Beaufort, the only sister of the late admiral Beaufort, who was Mary's father; they were then wards of Sir Fulke Somerset. Mr. Beaufort had been in the navy from a boy; but his sister remaining always at the castle, an affection as strong as it was mutual, took place between herself and her cousin Robert. When the young people applied to Sir Fulke for his consent to their marriage, he refused it on the plea of their youth. In vain the passionate Robert declared the reasonableness and ardour of his affection; his father urged his being only a younger son, and in other ways wholly unworthy his ward, unless he would consent to undergo the polish of a three year's tour over the continent. After much altercation, this arrangement was at length complied with; and Robert and Miss Beaufort bade each other adieu at the expense of many sighs and tears. Highly indignant at the unfeeling whim of Sir Fulke, and, provoked with his brother for backing his father's arguments, Robert Somerset set off for Dover, where he was joined by the present earl of Tinemouth (then Mr. Stanhope) who was banished the country on the same errand: but his was to forget a mistress: Somerset's to deserve one. Stanhope's mother and Robert's having been sisters, the young men met as relations; mutually enraged at the fathers, (their mothers having been long dead,) they determined to change their names, and to let no one know any thing about them during their travels, except the two women whom they best loved. To this end, as soon as they crossed the channel, and had landed in France, they gave themselves out to be brothers, which their great personal resemblance corroborated, and called themselves Sackville. This business settled, they travelled pretty amicably till they reached Naples. Here Mr. Stanhope involved himself in a very dishonourable intrigue with the only daughter of an old British officer, who had retired to that climate for his health. Somerset remonstrated on the villany of seducing an innocent girl, when he knew that his heart and hand were absolutely devoted to another; and Stanhope, enraged at finding a censor in a companion whom he had considered as headstrong as himself, ended the argument by striking him. Somerset drew his sword and it is likely, if the servants of their hotel had not interfered, the affray would have been terminated with one of their lives. Since that hour they never met again. Mr. Stanhope left his shame and his wounded friend: and, fearful of consequences, fled to Palermo. Robert Somerset, when recovered from his hurts (still retaining the name of Sackville) took the way to Florence, in which beautiful city, determining to stay some time, he rather sought than repelled the civilities of the inhabitants. Here he became acquainted with the Palatine, and the lovely Therese, whose affections he soon completely won. Soon after this intimacy commenced, Miss Beaufort ceased to answer his letters. Almost desperate with his fears, he was on the point of going to England, when he received a packet from home. On opening it, he found a letter from Miss Beaufort, wherein she informed him that having long considered their attachment as a childish entanglement, she had tried to wean him from his former folly, by continuing an obstinate silence. Having hardly a doubt that she had succeeded, she broke through her resolution. If I was to [illegible]

the communication I should [illegible] either her reputation [illegible]
her own hand. [illegible] to Mr. Somerset, [illegible]
: to her marriage with Lovel. [illegible] was called to a sick [illegible]
—and the moment of [illegible]
" she. "In the event [illegible]
rove his family for ever and [illegible] paroxysm of madness and [illegible] act perpetrated, as it was [illegible] hat she should [illegible] ungrateful Mary [illegible]
ecrating the perfidy of [illegible] packet found him. [illegible] writing, [illegible]
ere open the [illegible]
ther. Here Sir Rufus [illegible] ied his son. He [illegible] levised by Mr. Somerset, [illegible] ge the affections [illegible]
age. The wretched [illegible]
n, acknowledged [illegible] him by the sudden death of his eldest son, who now lay ee in the house. The disconsolate father having related urticulars of Mr. Somerset's death, (which happened hree days' illness,) added that it was in compliance with itreaties to preserve Miss Beaufort for him, that he had l to drive Robert from the kingdom. To further the e of making the separation for ever, he had intercepted eir mutual letters; and Mr. Somerset himself had that one in Miss Beaufort's name, which carried the gence of their union. By the same means, a similar was wrought upon the abused Mary; believing Robert rful, she fell into a melancholy, and evinced a careless-o exterior objects, which they hoped might in time in-er, through mere weakness of mind, to give her hand to rsecuting passion of Mr. Somerset. "But," continued
ilke, "death has put an end to this unnatural rivalry; ıy poor girl, undeceived in her opinion of you, pants to ou, and to give you that hand, which my ill-fated son, our unhappy father, so unjustly detained."
he receipt of this packet, with a soul divided between love, humanity, and honour, Robert Somerset sacrificed all to his passions. He adored the woman on whose account he had left his country, and, though every tie of heaven and earth bound him to his deceived and injured wife, he consigned her to the full horrors of such desertion, and hastened to England.

"Shameful to relate," added Sir Robert, "immediately on my landing, I married Mary Beaufort. In her arms I forgot for a while Therese and her agonies. But when my dear Pembroke first saw the light, when I pressed him to my heart, it seemed as if at the same instant I had stabbed it with a dagger. When I would have breathed a blessing over him, the conviction struck me, that I durst not; that I had deluded the mother who gave him birth; and at some future period, he might have cause to curse the author of his existence. Well," continued the Baronet, wiping his forehead, "though the birth of this boy had conjured up the image of your mother, which haunted me day and night; I never could summon courage to inquire respecting her fate. When the troubles of Poland commenced, what a dreadful apprehension seized me! The success of the Russians, and the consequent distresses of the nobility, overwhelmed me with fear; I knew not, but they might be forced like the French noblesse, to fly their country; and the bare idea of meeting your grandfather or the injured Therese in England, precipitated me into such a series of apprehensions, as nearly menaced my life. I became melancholy and ill; I avoided the sight of the newspapers; and, as far as I could (under the plea of the story which you have heard) I withheld my family from speaking on a subject which manifestly gave me pain. But I could not prevent the tongues of our visitors discoursing on a theme which at that period interested every thinking mind. I heard of the valiant Kosciuszko, the good Stanislaus, and the Palatine Sobieski with his brave grandson, spoken of in the same breath. I durst not surmise who this grandson was: I durst not ask; I dreaded to know. At length," added he, quickening his voice, "the idol of my heart, she, for whom I had perhaps sacrificed my eternal peace died in my arms! I received the shock, as became a Christian; I bent beneath the blow with humility; for I embraced it as the expiation of a crime, which till then, even in the midst of my felicity, had sat on my soul like the hand of death. I bore this trial with resignation. But when two years after, my eye fell by accident upon the name of Sobieski, in one of the public papers, I could not withdraw it again; my sight was fascinated as if rattlesnake; and, in one column I read how bravely the tine fell; and, in the next, the dreadful fate of his daugh-

"She was revenged!" cried Sir Robert, eagerly grasp-he hand of Thaddeus, who could not restrain the groan
h burst from his breast. "I was deprived of that reason, h had abused her noble nature for near three months wards. When I recovered my senses," continued he, a pause; "and found I had so fatally suffered the time stitution to go by, I began to torment myself, that I had on the death of Lady Somerset, immediately hastened to nd, and entreated Therese's pardon on my knees. This d of vivid remorse was soon terminated, by the same arents which for the first year of my wife's loss, had ded me from being just. I reconsidered, the Countess Sobihaving had a prior claim to my name, such restitution on part, must in consequence have illegitimized my darling broke. It was this horrid conviction," exclaimed Sir ert, a sudden distraction agitating his before affectionate "that caused all my cruelty to you. When my dear son ribed the danger from which you rescued him; when he me that Therese had fostered him with a mother's tender-
, I was probed to the heart; but when he added, that the g Count Sobieski was now an alien from his country, and ng on my friendship for a home, my terror was too truly ifested. Horror drove all natural remorse from my soul.
ought an avenging power had sent my deserted child to ver his father, to claim his rights; and to publish me as lain: and when I saw my innocent son, even on his knees, ioning for the man whom I believed was come to undo him, came almost frantic. Under this temper," added he, ing the trembling hand of Thaddeus to his streaming
, "I drove out my first-born, to be a guiltless wanderer ne face of the earth: not for his own crimes, but for those is father: and heaven punished my injustice. When I ght the evidence of my shame divided from me by an in-rable barrier; when I believed that the ocean would soon rate me from all my fears, a righteous Providence brought before my eyes forlorn and expiring. It was the son of rese Sobieski that I had exposed to such wretchedness!
as the darling of her heart, that I had consigned to the ing elements! Oh, Thaddeus," cried he, "can I be forgiven his?"

haddeus lulled the wakeful remorse of his venerable er, with such kind arguments of excuse for his cond-

at least imparted to him a consoling assurance of the generous affection of his son.

When this long and interesting conversation had terminated, Sir Robert well remembering the violent effects of Mr. Somerset's grief at Sobieski's flight and declared abjuration of England; pardoned his son the outrageous reproaches which had driven him from his own house, and very joyfully dispatched a messenger to desire his immediate presence at Deerhurst.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THAT sickness which is the consequence of mental pain, usually vanishes with its cause. Long before the evening of the ensuing day, Thaddeus had quitted his chamber, and related to his father the rapid incidents of his brief and eventful career. The voice of fame had already blazoned him abroad, as "the plume of war, with early laurels crowned," but it was left to his own eloquent tongue, to prove with all the pathos of modesty and feeling, that the most desperate conflicts are not those which we sustain in the field.

Sir Robert listened to him with affection, admiration, and delight. He was answering the interesting detail, with many grateful apostrophes to that Providence which had crowned his old age with pardon and peace, when a servant opened the door, and announced that Mr. Somerset was in the library.

Thaddeus instantly rose; but Sir Robert put him down again. "Remain here, my dear son," said he, "till I apprise your brother how nearly you are related to him. That door leads into my study; I will call you when he is prepared."

The moment Sir Robert joined Pembroke, he read in his pale and harassed countenance how much he required the intelligence which he came to communicate. Mr. Somerset bowed coldly on his father's entrance, and begged to be honoured with his commands.

"They are what I expect will restore you to your usual looks and manner, my dear boy," answered his father, taking his passive hand, and seating him by him; "so attend to me."

Pembroke listened to the beginning of the Baronet's narrative with respectful attention! but when the name of Theresa Sobieski was mentioned as the woman whom he had married and deserted; the ready apprenension of his son conceiving the rest, he had only to affirm his eager demand, that Thaddeus was indeed his brother, Pembroke looked wildly around him.

"O, my father!" cried he, "what have you done? Where is he? For what end have you sacrificed him?"

"Hear me to an end," rejoined the Baronet, who then, in as few words as possible, repeated the consequent events with the recent meeting.

Pembroke's transports were now as high as his despair had been deep. He threw himself on his father's breast; he asked for his friend, his brother; and begged to be conducted to him wherever he was. Sir Robert did no more than open the door which divided the library from the dining room, and in one moment the brothers were firmly locked in each other's arms.

Their father with a speechless tongue, but an eloquent heart, stood over them with uplifted hands, invoking the spirits of their beautiful mothers to behold this heavenly scene.

The feelings of the young men for a long time denied them words, but their eyes, their tears, and their united hands, imparted to each breast a consciousness of mutual love unutterable, if not to be expressed by those looks which are indeed the truest heralds of the soul.

Sir Robert wept like an infant, whilst contemplating these two affectionate brothers; in a faultering voice, he exclaimed, "How soon may these plighted hands be separated by the harpies of the law! Alas, Pembroke, you cannot be ignorant that I may buy this son at the price of your legitimacy!"

At this speech of his father's, the blood rushed over the ingenuous cheek of Pembroke; but Thaddeus turning instantly to Sir Robert, said with a smile:—

"On this head, I trust neither my father nor my brother will entertain one thought to trouble them. Had I even the inclination to act otherwise than right, my revered grandfather has put it out of my power to bear any other name than that of Sobieski. He made me swear never to change it; and, as I hope to meet him hereafter," added he, with solemnity, "I will obey him! Therefore, my beloved father, it is only in secret that I can enjoy the conviction that I am your son, and Pembroke's brother: yet, the happiness which I have received with the knowledge that I am so, will ever animate my heart with gratitude to heaven and to you."

"Noble son of the sainted Therese!" cried Sir Robert, "I do not deserve thee!"

"How shall I merit your care of my honour? of my dearest feelings?" exclaimed Pembroke, pressing the hands of his brother to his heart, "I can do nothing, dearest Thaddeus. I am a bankrupt in the means of evincing what is passing in my soul. My mother's chaste spirit thanks you from my lips; yet I will not abuse your generosity; though I retain the name of Somerset, it shall be only the name; the inheritance entailed on my father's eldest son belongs to you."

Whilst Thaddeus embraced his brother with affection, he calmly and firmly replied, that he would rather encounter all the probable miseries from which his father's benevolence had saved him, than rob his brother of any part of what he believed to be his just due.

Sir Robert with anguished delight, attempted to stop this generous contention, by saying, that it should be terminated by an equal division of his estates.

"Not so, my dear father," replied Thaddeus; "I will never consent that the title of Somerset shall want wealth to support the munificence of its possessor."

After a few more arguments, of the same tendency, the controversy being settled, the remainder of the evening passed in that sweet reciprocity of confidence and peace, which the imagination can best picture.

According to the decisions of this night, Sir Robert wrote next morning to his sister, informing her, that accident had introduced Pembroke's friend, the Count Sobieski, to his presence; when, to his amazement and joy, he discovered, that this celebrated young hero, though of a nation to which he had declared an abhorrence, was the only remaining branch of a family, to which he had owed unnumbered obligations. He added that, five and twenty years ago, having contracted an immense debt with the Palatine of Masovia, he had, as a small compensation, signed over to the Count (who would now resume all the honours of his rank) the house and estates of Deerhurst, to the amount of three thousand a year. He closed his letter, with many expressions of impatience to present to his sister and niece, their interesting emigre under a character which reflected honour on their esteem.

This epistle was put into the hands of Miss Dorothy, by an outrider, as she was following Miss Beaufort and Lady Albina Stanhope into the travelling coach. Miss Dorothy having seated herself, read it aloud to both young ladies; at every welcome word, the amazed and over joyed Mary felt her throbbing heart dropping tears of bliss and gratitude. The good old lady was not backward in demonstrating astonishment. Surprised at her brother's rencountre with Thaddeus, but more at his avowal of obligations to any of that nation, about whom he had always asserted directly the reverse; she was so immersed in wonder and pleasure, that her ever cheerful tongue, clothing itself in unaccustomed volubility, entertained the attentive Lady Albina all the way to Somerset, with the public as well as private history, of the Count Sobieski.

When the carriage arrived at Deerhurst it was past midnight; and to the no small disappointment of the ladies, the family had been retired to bed above an hour. Miss Dorothy, who would not suffer her brother to be disturbed, having ordered the girls to their rooms, was crossing one of the galleries to her own apartment, when a door opening, Pembroke in his night-gown and slippers, looked out. He had heard a bustle, and was going to inquire the reason, just as his aunt appeared. She kissed him, bade him good night, told him to prepare for something pleasing in the morning; and, smiling, hurried on to her chamber.

Pembroke had thought so little of Miss Dorothy's lively promise, that he was almost the last who descended to the breakfast-parlour. Miss Dorothy reproached him for his undutiful laziness; and Miss Beaufort, with an anxious consciousness glowing on her cheek, embraced her cousin, and whispered, "Now I shall see the two dearest friends I possess happy in each other."

Mary's vivid blush had not subsided, when the sudden entrance of Thaddeus, and his agitated bow, overspread her neck and bosom with crimson. A dimness seemed to obscure her faculties: she hardly heard the animated words of Sir Robert, whilst he presented him as the Count Sobieski, the darling son of one who had deserved the highest place in his heart. Whatever he was, she felt that he was lord of hers, and withdrawing her hand hastily from the timid and thrilling touch of him, she would have lingered near for ever; she glided back towards an open casement, where the fresh air helped to dispel the faintness which had seized her.

After Miss Dorothy, with all the urbanity of her nature, had declared her welcomes to the Count, she put away the coffee that was handed to her by Pembroke, and said with a smile, "Before I taste my breakfast, I must inform you, Sir Robert, that you have a guest in this house you little expect. I forbade Mary saying a word because, as we are told, 'the first tellers of unwelcome news have but a losing office;' vice versa, I hoped for a gaining one.; therefore detained such a pleasing piece of intelligence for my own promulgation. Indeed, I doubt whether or no it will not intoxicate some folks here," added she, glancing archly on Pembroke, who had looked suddenly round at this whimsical declaration; "suffice it to say, that yesterday morning Lady Albina Stanhope, more dead than alive, accompanied by her maid, arrived in a post-chaise at Somerset Castle and implored our protection as relations. Our dear Mary embraced the poor weeping young creature, who, amidst many tears, recapitulated the horrors she had suffered, since she parted with the Count Sobieski at the Abbey. The latest outrage of her cruel father, was his immediate marriage with the vile Lady Sophia Lovel; and his commands, that Lady Albina would treat her as became a daughter. Ill as her ladyship was, when she received these disgraceful orders, she determined to escape them and the degradation they would otherwise cast on the memory of her own mother, by instantly quitting home. To this end she engaged her maid to assist her flight; 'and,' added she, 'where was I to go? Who would receive the unfortunate victim of the profligate Lady Sophia? I could think of none so likely as the father of the generous Mr. Somerset. He told me we were relations; I beseech you, to be my friends!' As I am sensible your benevolent heart, my dear brother," continued Miss Dorothy, "would have dictated the same, I stopped this sweet girls petition with my caresses, and promised her a kinder father in Sir Robert Somerset."

"You did right, Dorothy," returned the Baronet, "though the Earl and I must ever be strangers, I have no enmity against his children. Where is this amiable Lady Albina?"

Miss Dorothy informed him that in consequence of her recent grief and ill treatment, her ladyship had found herself too unwell to rise with the family; but she would hope to join them at noon.

Pembroke was indeed deeply interested in this intelligence. The simple graces of the lovely Albina had, on the first interview, penetrated his heart. Her sufferings at Harrowby, and the sensibility which her ingenuous nature exhibited without affectation or disguise, had left her image in his soul, long after she disappeared. He now gave the reins to his imagination, and was the first in the saloon, to greet his y mistress.

Robert Somerset welcomed her with the warmth of a it: but his animated and enraptured son broke out into ıost vehement expressions of joy, which she received with and grateful bows.
ıring the scene, Miss Beaufort, no longer able to bear the ıint of company, nor even the accidental glances of ıski (whose presence, dear as it was, disconcerted and ıssed her) walked out into the park. Though it was the h of October, the weather continued fine. A bright sun ered the air, and gilded the yellow leaves which the fresh drove before her in a thousand glittering eddies. This Mary's favourite season. She found its softness diffuse ıurest melancholy over her soul. The rugged form of seems to dissolve under the magic touch of beautiful
re. Forgetful of the world's anxieties, the tranquilizing of meditation shades the heart of sorrow with a veil, ı might well be called the twilight of the mind; and ıtranced soul, happy in delusion, half closes its bright eye, ant to perceive that such sweet repose rests in error.
:h were the reflections of Mary, after her disturbed hts had tossed themselves in a sea of doubts, relative to ıterest she might probably possess in the heart of Sobi-Wearied out with suspense, she resolved to resign her : fate to Providence; and, turning her gaze on the lovely s around, soon found the genius of the season absorb holly. Her cheek glowed, her eyes became humid, and g their mild radiance on the fading flowers beneath, she ed her way through a cloud of fragrance. It was the reath of the expiring year. Love is full of imagination.
easily glided from the earth's departing charms, to her waning beauty; the chord once touched, every note ıerated: and hope, and fear, joy and regret, again dis-ıed her acquired serenity.
ıeing near three o'clock, Lady Albina having expressed h to walk out in search of Miss Beaufort, the two brooffered their attendance. Before her ladyship had d through the first park, she complained of fatigue;
roke, alarmed, urged her to enter a shepherd's hut close hilst the count Sobieski would proceed alone in quest of ısin.
ıddeus, with a beating heart, undertook this commission;
ınding over the rustic bridge which crossed the Witham.

hastened along the nearest dell. With the lightness of a young hunter, he mounted the heights, descended to the vallies, traversed one woody nook, and then another, but could see no trace of Miss Beaufort. Almost induced to suppose she had returned to the house, he was slackening his pace to abandon the search, when he caught a glimpse of her figure as she turned the corner of a thicket leading to the terrace above. In an instant he was at her side; with a faultering voice, his hat in his hand, his bosom panting, the cheek glowing with confusion, he repeated his errand.

Mary blushed, trembled, and was alarmed at finding herself alone with Thaddeus. Though he now stood before her in a quality which she had ever believed was his right, yet the remembrance of what had passed between them, when in other circumstances, confounded and overwhelmed her. When Constantine was poor and unfriended, it was delicious to pity and love him. When the same Constantine appeared as a man of rank, invested with a splendid fortune, and extensive fame, she was lost, annihilated. The cloud which had obscured, not extinguished his glory, was dispersed. He was that Sobieski whom she had admired unseen: he was that Constantine whom she had loved unknown; he was that Sobieski, that Constantine, who, seen and known, she now adored.

Weighed down by the weight of these reflections, she only bowed to what he said; and gathering her cloak from the winds that blew it round her, and hurrying with downward eyes to the stairs of the terrace, when her foot slipping, she must have fallen, had not Thaddeus caught her on his arm. She rose from it with a face blushing like scarlet; and that colour did not recede, when she found he had not relinquished her hand. Her heart swelled, her head became giddy, her feet trembled, and finding, that after a slight motion of her arm, he still held it fast; nearly overcome by inexplicable distress, she turned away her face to conceal its confusion.

Thaddeus saw all this; and, with a flattering hope, instead of surrendering that hand which he had retained, he made it yet a closer prisoner, by grasping it in both his; and, pressing it earnestly to his breast, said, in a hurried voice, whilst his eloquent eyes poured all their beams upon her averted cheek, "Surely, Miss Beaufort will not deny me the dearest happiness I possess: the privilege of gratitude to her."

He paused: his soul was too full for utterance; and raising Mary's hand from his heart to his lips, he kissed it fervently.

Almost fainting, Miss Beaufort struggled to withdraw it; and leaning her head, which she was now unable to support, against a tree of the thicket where they were standing, waved her released hand in sign for him to leave her.

Such extraordinary agitation palsied all the warmth and blissful emotions of the Count. Dreading that he had offended her, that she might suppose he had presumed on her kindness, he stood for a moment in silent astonishment; then droping on his knees, (hardly conscious of doing so,) caught hold of her cloak; with an energy of action and voice, which spoke more impetuosity of feeling, than for a long time he had suffered to escape his heart; he implored her pardon, for what had passed.

"Forgive me," added he; with increased earnestness; "forgive me in justice to your own virtues. I meant only to thank you for your goodness to an unfortunate exile; but if my words or manner have obeyed the more fervid impulse of my soul, and declared aloud, what is its glory in secret; blame my nature, most respected Miss Beaufort, not my presumption. I have not dared to look steadily on any aim, higher than your esteem."

Mary knew not how to consider this address. The position in which he uttered it, his countenance, when she turned to answer him, were both declarative of something less equivocal than his speech. He was still grasping the drapery of her cloak; and his eyes, from which the wind blew back his fine air, were beaming upon her, full of that piercing tenderness which at once dissolves and seizes the soul.

She passed her hand over her own eyes; with an attempt at self-command, she begged him to rise, and instinctively held out her hand to assist him; he obeyed, and she continued, "You have done nothing, my lord, to offend me. I was only fearful that my conduct——what I had done to serve you as a person my aunt esteemed, might have lessened me—might have led you to imagine, that I would not have acted the same part by any man in such circumstances."

Every emotion which faultered on the tongue of Mary, met an answering pang in the breast of Thaddeus. Fearing that he had set his heart on the possession of a treasure totally out of his reach, he knew not how high had been his hope, till he now felt the depth of his disappointment. He suffered the hand of Miss Beaufort to drop; and taking up his hat, which lay on the grass, with a countenance from which every gleam of joy had vanished, he bowed respectfully; and, in a low tone, replied, "Having the dependant situation in which I appeared at Lady Dundas's ever before my eyes, I had not the folly to suppose, that any lady could then notice my misfortunes, influenced by any other consideration than her humanity. That I excited this humanity, where alone I was proud to awaken it, was in those hours of dejection my sole comfort: It consoled me for the friends I had lost: it repaid me for the honors that were no more. But that is past! Seeing no farther cause for compassion, you deem the delusion no longer necessary. Since you will not allow me any individual distinction in having attracted your benevolence, though I am to ascribe all to a charity as diffusive as effective, yet I must ever acknowledge, with the deepest gratitude, that I owe my present home and happiness to Miss Beaufort. Farther than this, I shall never presume."

These words shifted all the Count's anguish to Mary's breast. She perceived the offended delicacy which actuated every syllable as they fell; and fearful of having incurred their reproof, by her cold and haughty reply, she opened her lips to say something that might better explain what she meant, but her heart failing her, she closed them again, and continued to walk in silence by his side. Having allowed the opportunity to escape, she believed all her hopes of exculpation to be at an end; and, not daring to look up, she took a last despairing glance at Sobieski's graceful figure as he walked near her. His arms were folded, his hat pulled over his forehead, and his long dark eye-lashes shading his downward eyes, imparted a dejection to his whole air, which wrapped her weeping heart round and round with regretful pangs.

"Ah!" thought she, "though the offspring of but one moment, they will prey on my peace for ever."

At the turning of a little wooded knoll, this silent and pensive pair heard the sound of some one on the other side, walking fastly through the heaps of dried leaves. In a minute after, Sir Robert Somerset approached them.

Whilst his father advanced smiling towards him, Thaddeus attempted to dispel the gloom of his countenance; but not succeeding, he bowed abruptly to the agitated Mary; and hastily said, "I will leave Miss Beaufort in your protection, Sir; and go myself to see whether or not Lady Albina be recovered from her fatigue."

"I thought to find you all together," returned Sir Robert "Where is her ladyship?"

"I left her with Pembroke in a hut by the river," said

Thaddeus, and bowing again, he hurried away, whilst his father called after him to return in a few minutes and accompany him in a walk.

This immediate desertion of Sobieski, when he had come expressly to attend her to Lady Albina, nearly overwhelmed Miss Beaufort's before exhausted spirits; hardly knowing whether to remain or to retreat, she was attempting the latter when her uncle caught her by the arm.

"Stay!" cried he, "why Mary you surely would not leave me quite alone?"

Mary's tears had gushed over her eyes the moment her back was turned; and as Sir Robert drew her towards him, to his extreme amazement he saw that she was weeping. At a sight so unexpected, the smile of hilarity left his lips. Putting his arm tenderly round her waist (for now that her distress had discovered itself, her agitation became so great that she could hardly stand) he inquired in an affectionate voice, what had afflicted her?

She only answered by her sobs; till finding it impossible to break away from her uncle's arms, she hid her face in his bosom, and gave a loose to the full tide of her tears.

Sir Robert, recollecting the strange haste in which Thaddeus had hurried from them, and remembering Miss Beaufort's generosity to him in town, followed by her succeeding melancholy, at once united these circumstances with her present confusion; and conceiving an instantaneous suspicion of the reality, pressed her with redoubled affection to his bosom.

"I fear, my dearest girl," said he, "that something disagreeable has happened between you and the Count Sobieski? Perhaps he has offended you? Perhaps he has found my sweet Mary too amiable?"

Miss Beaufort, alarmed at this supposition; after a short struggle, answered, "O no, Sir! It is I who have offended him. He thinks that I pride myself on the insignificant services which I rendered to him in London."

This reply convinced the Baronet, that he had not been premature in his judgment; and, with a new born delight springing in his soul, he inquired why she thought so? Had he given him any reason to believe so?

Mary trembled at saying more. Dreading that every word she might utter, would betray how highly she prized the Count's esteem; she faultered, hesitated, stopped. Sir Robert put the question a second time in different terms.

"My loved Mary," said he, seating her by him on the trunk of a tree which had been newly felled, "I am sincerely anxious that you and this young nobleman should regard each other as friends; he is very dear to me; and you cannot doubt, my sweet girl, my affection for yourself. Tell me, therefore, the cause of this little misunderstanding?"

Miss Beaufort took courage at the kindness of this speech. Drying her glowing eyes, though still concealing them with a handkerchief, she replied in a firmer voice; "I believe, sir, that the fault lies totally on my side. The Count Sobieski met me on the terrace, and thanked me for what I had done for him. I acted very weakly; I was confused. Indeed, I know not what he said; but he fell upon his knees, and I became so disconcerted, so frightened, of his having attributed my behaviour to indelicacy or forwardness, that I answered something that offended him. And I am sure, he now thinks me inhuman and proud."

Sir Robert kissed her throbbing forehead, as she ended this rapid and hardly articulate explanation.

"Tell me candidly, my dearest Mary!" said he, "Can you believe that a man of Sobieski's disposition, would kneel to a woman whom he did not both respect and love? Simple gratitude, my dear girl, is not so earnest. You have said enough to convince me, whatever be your sentiments, that you are the mistress of his fate; and, if he should mention it to me, may I tell him the scene which has now passed between us? May I tell him, that its just inference would requite his tenderness with more than your thanks and best wishes?"

Sir Robert ended the sentence in a gay tone; but Mary, whose nice sensibility could not follow her uncle to his sanguine conclusion, looked modestly down, and with a half suppressed sigh, answered; "I will not deny that I esteem the Count Sobieski. I admired his character before I saw him: and when I saw him, although ignorant that it was he, my respect increased. Yet, I never have aspired to any share in his heart, or even his remembrance: I could not have the presumption. Therefore, my dear uncle," added she, laying her trembling hand on his arm, and directing her fluctuating eyes to his face, "I beseech you, as you value my feelings, my peace of mind! never to breathe a syllable of my folly to him. I think," added she, clasping her hands with energy, and forgetting the force of her expression, "I would sooner suffer death than lose his esteem."

"And yet," inquired Sir Robert, "you will at some future period give your hand to another man.?"

Mary, who did not consider the extent of this insidious question, answered with fervour, "never—I never can be happier than I am," added she with breathless haste, seeing by the smile on Sir Robert's lips, that far more had been declared by her manner, than the words intended. Fearful of betraying herself farther, she begged permission to retire to the house.

The Baronet, now looking very serious, took her hand; and re-seating her by him, said, "No, my dearest Mary; you shall not leave me unless you honestly avow what are your sentiments of the Count Sobieski. You know, my sweet girl, that I have tried to make you regard me as a father: to induce you to receive from my love, the treble affection of your deceased parents and my lamented wife? If my Mary does not deny this, she cannot treat me with reserve."

Miss Beaufort was unable to restrain her tears. Sir Robert continued,

"I will not overwhelm your delicacy by repeating the inquiry, whether I have mistaken the source of your recent emotion; only allow me to bestow some encouragement on the Count's attachment, should he claim my services in its behalf."

Mary put her uncle's hand to her lips, and kissed it, whilst her dropping tears fell on it; and then replied in a timid voice; "I should be a monster of ingratitude, could I hide any thing from you, my dearest Sir, after all this kindness! I confess, that I do esteem the Count Sobieski more than any other being on earth. Who could see and know him, and feel it possible to regard another!"

"And you shall be his! my darling Mary!" cried the Baronet, mingling his own blissful tears with hers; "I had once hoped to have contrived an attachment between you and Pembroke, but heaven has decreed it better. When you and Thaddeus are united, I shall be happy; I may then die in peace."

Mary sighed heavily. She could not participate in her uncle's rapture. She thought that she had insulted and disgusted the Count by her late behaviour; and was opening her lips to urge it again, when the object of their conversation appeared at a little distance coming towards them. Full of renewed trepidation, she burst from the Baronet's hand; and taking to flight, left her uncle to meet Sobieski alone.

Sir Robert's anxious question, received a more rapid reply from Thaddeus, than had proceeded from the reluctant Miss Beaufort. The animated gratitude of Sobieski; the ardent, yet respectful manner with which he declared her eminence, above all other women, soon convinced the Baronet, that Mary's retreating delicacy had misinformed her. A complete explanation was the consequence; and Thaddeus, who had not been more sanguine in his hopes than his lovely mistress; allowed the clouds over his sunny eyes to disappear.

Sir Robert, impatient to see these two beings so dear to his heart, repose confidently in each other's affection, the moment he returned to the house, asked his sister for Miss Beaufort. Miss Dorothy having replied, that she had seen her about half an hour ago retire to her own apartments, the Baronet sent a servant up stairs, to beg that she would meet him in the library.

This message found Mary in a paroxysm of distress. She reproached herself for her imprudence, her temerity, her unwomanly conduct, in having given away her heart, to a man who had never seemed to require it. She remembered that her weakness, not her sincerity, had betrayed this humiliating secret to Sir Robert: and, nearly at her wit's end, with a beating heart, she was traversing the room, almost hoping she was in a miserable dream, when her maid entered with the Baronet's commands.

Disdaining herself, and determined to regain some portion of her own respect by steadily opposing all her uncle's deluding hopes, with an assumed serenity she arrived at the study door. She laid her hand on the lock, but the moment it yielded to the touch, all her firmness vanished; and trembling, and pale as death, she appeared before him.

Sir Robert having supported her to a chair; with the tenderest and most delicate expressions of paternal love, repeated to her the sum of his conversation with the Count. Mary was almost wild at this discourse. She dreaded that the first proposal of their union had come from her uncle; and burying her agitated face in her hands, exclaimed, "O Sir! I fear that you have for ever made me despicable in my own eyes; that you have told the Count Sobieski how weak I have been!"

Sir Robert tried to assure her, that she alarmed herself without a cause; but she would not, she could not be pacified; she believed that her tenderness and delicacy had been made a rash sacrifice; and was siting gloomily weeping on a window-seat, when the Baronet gently added, "Well, Mary, since I cannot prevail over this strange incredulity, I will call in a more powerful pleader."

He rose and opened the door which led to the dining-room. Miss Beaufort instantly got up, and flying to the opposite door, would have retreated, had not Sir Robert suddenly thrown himself in her way. He threw his arm about her waist, and turning her round she saw the Count, who had entered, standing and regarding her with an anxiety which covered her before pale features with blushes.

His father bid him come near. Sobieski immediately obeyed, though with a step that expressed how reluctant he was to oppress the woman whom he so deeply loved. Mary's face was now hidden in her uncle's bosom. Sir Robert put her almost lifeless hand into that of his son; who, dropping on his knees, said, in an agitated voice, "Dearest Miss Beaufort, do you really recall those cruel words which you directed to me this morning? May I indulge myself in the idea that I am blest with your esteem?"

Mary could not reply, but whispered to her uncle, "Pray, Sir, desire the Count to rise! I am already sufficiently overwhelmed."

"My sweet Mary!" returned the Baronet, pressing her in his arms; "this is no time for deception on either side. I know both your hearts. Rise, Thaddeus," said he, to the Count, whilst he locked both their hands closely within his; "take him, Mary: receive from your uncle his most precious gift; my matchless and injured son."

The shock which the first part of this speech occasioned Miss Beaufort would have sunk her exhausted spirits to insensibility, had not the extraordinary assertion at its end, aroused and surprised her.

"Gracious Providence!" exclaimed she, "What do you mean, my dear uncle?"

"Thaddeus will explain all to you," returned he, "May heaven bless you both! I leave you together; and from him you will be confirmed in the truth of what I say."

Mary was too much astonished to think of following her uncle out of the room. She sunk on a seat, and turning her eyes full of amazement towards the Count, seemed to demand an explanation. Thaddeus, who still retained her passive hand, pressed it warmly to his heart; and whilst his effulgent eyes were beaming rapture and love, he imparted to her a concise but impressive narrative of his relationship with Sir Robert, and their late arrangement. He touched with a short, yet ardent enthusiasm, on the virtues of his mother; he acknowledged the unbounded gratitude which belonged to that God who had so wonderfully conducted him to find a parent and a home in England; and with renewed pathos of look and manner, ratified the proffer which Sir Robert had made of his heart and hand.

Mary had listened with uncontrollable emotion to this interesting detail. Her eyes overflowed: their ingenuous language, enforced by the eloquent blood which glowed on her cheek, did not require the medium of words to declare what she felt. Thaddeus gazed on her with a certainty of bliss, which penetrated his soul till its feelings almost amounted to pain. The heart may ache with joy: neither sighs nor language could express what passed in the Count's; he held her hand to his lips; his other arm fell unconsciously round her waist; and in a moment he found that he had pressed her to his breast. His heart beat violently. Miss Beaufort rose instantaneously from her chair, but her pure nature needed no disguise; she looked up to him, whilst her blushing eyes were raining down tears of delight; and pronounced in a trembling voice, "Tell my dear uncle, that Mary Beaufort glories in the means by which she becomes his daughter."

She moved to the door; Thaddeus, whose full tide of transport denied him utterance, only clasped her hands again to his lips and bosom; then relinquishing them with reluctance, he suffered her to quit the room.

CONCLUSION.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The magnificent establishment which this projected union offered to Sobieski, seemed to heal the yet bleeding conscience of Sir Robert Somerset. Although he had acquiesced in the Count's generous surrender of the family honours, his heart remained ill at ease. Every dutiful expression from this long neglected son, stabbed him with unavailing remorse. Conscious that this criminal marriage with Pembroke's mother, had deprived the son of Therese of his just inheritance, he could never meet Sobieski's filial attentions without experiencing pangs of self-reproach which embittered all his joy. Miss

Beaufort's avowed and returned affection, at once removed the sting of this incessant recollection: mistress of immense wealth, her hand would put the injured Thaddeus in possession, not only of those pure delights dependent alone on mutual sympathy of soul, but again empower his munificent spirit to exert itself in the disposal of an almost princely fortune.

Such meditations having followed the now tranquilized Baronet to his pillow, they brought him into the breakfast parlour next day full of that calm pleasure which promises a steady continuation. The happy family were assembled. Miss Dorothy saluted her brother, whose brightened eye declared he had something pleasant to communicate; and he did not keep her a moment in suspense. With the first dish of coffee which was poured out, his grateful heart unburthened itself of its delightful tidings, that before the present month should expire, Miss Beaufort would give her hand to the Count Sobieski.

Pembroke was the only hearer who did not express surprise at this declaration; the transported Thaddeus had flown to his bed-side the preceding night, and with a bounding and enraptured heart, had related the whole of the recent scenes.

During Sir Robert's animated speech, Mary's blushing yet triumphant eyes, sought a veil in a branch of geranium which she held in her trembling hand and affected to smell.

Miss Dorothy immediately rose from her chair: her heightened colour and glittering eyes spoke more than her lips, when she pressed, first her neice, and then the Count Sobieski, in her venerable arms.

"Heaven bless you both!" cried she, "This marriage will be the glory of my age."

Mary turned from the embrace of her aunt to meet the warm congratulations of Pembroke. Whilst he kissed her burning cheek, he whispered loud enough for every one else to hear; "And why may I not participate in my good aunt's triumph? Attempt it dear Mary! If you can persuade my father to allow me to make myself as happy with Lady Albina Stanhope, as you will render Sobieski, I shall for ever bless you!"

Lady Albina coloured like scarlet. Sir Robert took her hand with a smile of pleased surprise. "Do you my lovely guest? Do you sanction, what this bold boy has just said?"

Lady Albina made no answer; but blushing deeper than before, cast a side-long glance at Pembroke, as if to petition his support. He was at her side in an instant: then seriously and earnestly entreating his father's consent to an union with her ladyship; (whose approbation of his passion he had obtained the preceding day in the shepherd's hut;) he awaited the sounds which seemed faultering on Sir Robert's lips.

The Baronet, quite overcome by his darling Pembroke having, like his brother, disposed of his heart so much to his own honour, found himself unable to say what he wished; and joining the hands of the two young people in silence, he hurried out of the room. He ascended immediately to the library, where, kneeling down, he returned devout thanks to that all gracious Being, who had crowned one so unworthy, with blessings so conspicuous.

Thaddeus, no less than his father, remembered the hand which having guided him through a thorny but short path of sorrow, had in the end conducted him to an Eden of bliss; his heart did not forget, even in the midst of gaiety and smiles, the ardent gratitude which was due to the beneficent dispenser of his happiness.

Before the lapse of a week, it was discovered that Sir Robert must hasten the marriage of Pembroke with Lady Albina, or be forced by law, to yield her to the demands of her father. After some search, Lord Tinemouth had learned that his daughter was under the protection of Sir Robert Somerset. Inflamed with rage and revenge he sent to order her immediate return, under pain of an instantaneous appeal to the courts of judicature.

Too well aware that her non-age made her completely obnoxious to this threat, Lady Albina fell into the most alarming fits on the first communication of this message. Sir Robert urged, that in her circumstances, no authority could be opposed to the Earl's, except that of a husband; and on this consideration, she complied with his arguments and the prayers of her lover, directly to give that power into the hands of Pembroke.

Accordingly, next morning by day break, accompanied by Miss Dorothy and the enraptured Mr. Somerset, the terrified Lady Albina commenced her journey to Scotland; that being the only place where, in her situation, the marriage could be legally solemnized.

Whilst these young runaways, chaperoned by an old maiden aunt, were pursuing their rapid flight to Gretna Green, Sir Robert sent his steward to London to prepare two houses near his own in Grosvenor-square, for the reception of his children. During these necessary arrangements, a happy fortnight elapsed at Deerhurst. Thrice happy to Mary, because its tranquil hours imparted to her captive heart "a sober certainty of that waking bliss," which had so often animated the visions of her imagination. Morning, noon, and evening, the companion of the Count Sobieski, she saw with added enthusiasm, that the sublime and princely virtues did not reign alone in his bosom. Their insufferable brightness was rendered less intense, and was beautifully veiled, by the softening shades of those gentle amiabilities, which are the soothers and sweeteners of life. His breast seemed the residence of love; of a love, that not only infused a warmer existence through her soul, but diffused such a light of benevolence over every being within its influence, that all appeared happy who caught a beam of his eye; all enchanted, who shared the magic of his smile. Under what different effects had she seen this man! yet how consistent! At the first period of their acquaintance, she had beheld him like that glorious orb which her ardent fancy told her he resembled, struggling with the storm, or looking with steady grandeur through the clouds which obscured his path: But now, like the radiant sun of summer, amidst a splendid sky, he seemed to stand, the source of light, and love, and joy.

Thus did the warm fancy, and warmer heart of Mary Beaufort, paint the image of her lover; and when Sir Robert received intelligence that the Gretna Green party had got to town, and were impatient for the arrival of the dear inhabitants of Deerhurst, she felt some embers of human frailty sparkle in her bosom, at the anticipation of witnessing the homage which those who had despised the unfriended Constantine, would pay to the declared and illustrious Sobieski.

The news of Lady Albina's marriage, enraged the Earl of Tinemouth almost to madness. Well aware that his withholding her ladyship's fortune would occasion no uneasiness to a family of Sir Robert Somerset's vast possessions, he gave way to still more vehement bursts of passion; and in a fit of impotent threatening, embarked with all his household, to spend the remainder of the season on his estates in Ireland.

This abrupt departure of the Earl caused Lady Albina little uneasiness. His unremitted cruelty, her brother's indifference, and the barbed insults of Lady Sophia Lovel, had rankled too deep, to leave any filial regret behind. Considering their absence as a suspension of pain, rather than as a punishment, she did not stain the kiss which she imprinted on the venerable cheek of her new parent, with one tear to the memory of her unnatural father.

Whilst all was preparation, splendour, and happiness, in Grosvenor-square, Thaddeus did not forget the excellent Mrs. Robson. He had seen her twice, and had left with her the first payment of an annuity that would render herself and her grand-daughter independent for life. Neither did he neglect Mr. Burnett. It was not in his nature to allow any one who had served him to pass unrequited. He visited him one day in his rounds; and having repaid him, with a generosity that astonished even the good money-lender: he took his sword, with the other relics of what were once so dear, and pressing them mournfully, yet gratefully, to his breast, re-entered Sir Robert's carriage, and was set down at his brother's house, about an hour before dinner.

Lady Albina Somerset's arrival in London, had been greeted by the immediate calls of the people in town, who either had been acquainted with the late Countess of Tinemouth, or were known to the Baronet's family. Among the earliest names whose tickets appeared at her ladyship's door, were those of Lord Berrington, Dr. Blackmore, Captain and Mrs. Montresor, and Dr. Cavendish. Lady Albina did not propose opening her gates to the gay world till Miss Beaufort and the Count were married, and they and she had been presented at Court, but having heard Pembroke speak of the before mentioned persons with particular respect, (when she took the list of her numerous visitors out of the footman's hand,) she selected them as the first party which should grace her table.

Thaddeus had flown to his kind friend Cavendish, the very day on which he came to town; and telling him with a smiling countenance, that he was that Sobieski, about whose strange fate he had so often expressed an interest; the astonished and delighted doctor embraced him with an ardour, which spoke better than language, his admiration and esteem.

When the Count alighted at Mr. Somerset's door, on the day of his call on the money-lender, he was agreeably surprised by finding the invited group in the saloon. Lord Berrington, and the ever lively Maria Egerton, now Mrs. Mountresor, ran up to him at the same instant, and expressed their sincere joy at not only seeing him again, but in a situation so consonant to his fame and quality.

Thaddeus replied to their solicitations with a frankness and grace peculiarly his own; and was not a little surprised, when Dr. Blackmore, a moment afterwards recognized him to be the ngaged his attention about a year recollection of this circumstance, till or brought the very hour to his remembrance, by ning the Hummums, and recapitulating the rudeness man in black, whose name he since had learned was broke could hardly hear the worthy clergyman to an

He exclaimed against his vile tutor's indefatigable,
; and turning to Sir Robert, said, "My dear Sir, ent hurrying events have hitherto averted justice from this man; but I must beg, that his connexion with ing belonging to us may end to-morrow. Write to nd order him to resign his situation at Arun-house
ately."

Baronet promised; and Sobieski, trying to change a sation which agitated his brother, addressed Mrs. Monon some general topic. Capt. Montresor joined them, pressed great regret at the loss he should shortly sus-
the absence of his friend Captain Roos.

w? Where is he going?" demanded his wife.

tresor replied, by lamenting the ill state of Lady loos's health, and the necessity which her husband
o carry her to Italy for its restoration.

et him this morning," continued he, "quite in despair er."

ideus too well divined, that this increased indisposition ts rise to his return to town; and inwardly petitioning t that absence might complete her cure, he could not s the sigh which her fatal devotedness to him wrung
s pity and his gratitude.

ne present, except the affectionate Mary, marked the nt melancholy which passed over his countenance.
ho had suspected the unhappy Lady Sara Roos's nent, loved Thaddeus, if possible, still dearer, for the sion he bestowed on the victim of a passion, which is utable as destructive.

n the party descended to dinner, Miss Dorothy, who t to Thaddeus, rallied him on the loss he had sustained of his most potent admirers. This strange attack ng so instantly the information relating to Lady Sara ummoned a fervid colour into the face of the Count; ed surprised, and rather confused at the good old lady;
iling, related that she had been told by her milliner this morning, that Miss Eu

nobleman near Hamilton.

"So much the better for m
"Her jealous fears are now at a no contemptible rival. Besides, A gaily to her Ladyship, "You may congratu the same score. I hear that an old friend of mine is going t take her loving sister off my hands. Come Dr. Cavendish, you must validate my report, for I learnt it of you."

The good doctor smiled, and answered in the affirmative; adding, that his friend at Stamford had written to him as news, that the eldest son of Sir Halerand Shafto, was on the point of marriage with Miss Dundas, a rich East Indian heiress, who was visiting my lady."

Sobieski wished them both happy. Lord Berrington protested that his Lordship was more generous than just.

"I vow to heaven," cried the young viscount, "I never knew people, the end of whose lives seemed so bent on mischief. Euphemia, pretty as she is, was better known by her spirit of tormenting, than by her beauty: and as for the poor squire whom Diana has conjured into matrimony, I have little doubt of his future honours."

"Ah!" cried Mrs. Montresor, "poor Acteon! I warrant she will allot him the punishment he merits for stepping between her and that delectable Endymion, Fool Lascelles!"

"A truce, my dear madam?" entreated Miss Beaufort.

"She does not deserve it of you," returned the laughing lady, pursuing the subject, till Miss Dorothy and Sir Robert Somerset were both obliged to call very loudly upon charity.

Thaddeus, who knew not the nature of those sensations which constitute a rejoicing over the probable misconduct of his enemies, considered this part of the conversation, as by far the least pleasant of the day.

Pembroke's wish, with regard to Mr. Loftus, was complied with next morning. Dr. Blackmore having been prevailed upon to take charge of the young Lord Arun, and reluctantly bore the mandate for his predecessor's dismission, and set out the same day for the seat of his Lordship's aunt.

Whilst Sir Robert Somerset denounced the guilty, he was careful neither to plunge him into fresh temptations, nor to suffer his crimes to injure the innocent. In pity to age and helplessness, he settled two hundred pounds per annum on the wretched man's mother and sisters in Wales. And shortly after, in consequence of Loftus confessing that all Pembroke's rations were but too just, Sir Robert adjudged one hunl yearly, to the culprit himself, that at least he might not educed to obtain by deeper villany, a subsistence. As for iving at Somerset, which had been the price of Mr. Loftus's grity, that Sir Robert determined to bestow on Dr. Blacke, whenever it should fall.

he appointed day oeing arrived, in which Mary was to herself and her earthly happiness, into the power of the man, whom having once beheld, she ever could have ned them to; she pronounced her vows at the altar with nsteadiness of tongue, but a fixed heart: and when she ited at Somerset's cottage in Epping Forest, she received ongratulations of her dear friends, with a tenderness and ation of soul, which drowned her glowing and enraptured with tears.

he Count Sobieski was not less sensible of the favoured which Providence had spread before him. He had ed through hosts of evils, and he now looked forward to ng Sabbath of peace and gratitude. He found it at the ge. He enjoyed its full possession, when he returned to i he saw his beautiful wife at the head of fashion, not only ning his house, but filling his home with all the ineffable forts of domestic life and domestic virtues.

ne fine evening in which they were out together, she red the carriage to stop in Covent Garden; when it drew she expressed a wish to walk through the church-yard.
ddeus immediately complied; and before he had time to ess his surprise at the strangeness of her request, she led towards the grave of his revered friend Butzou, who had buried there. It was no longer the same; a white mar-able occupied the place of the grass and yarrow. The it bent forward, and read with swimming eyes, the wing inscription:

STOP TRAVELLER,

THOU TREADEST UPON A HERO

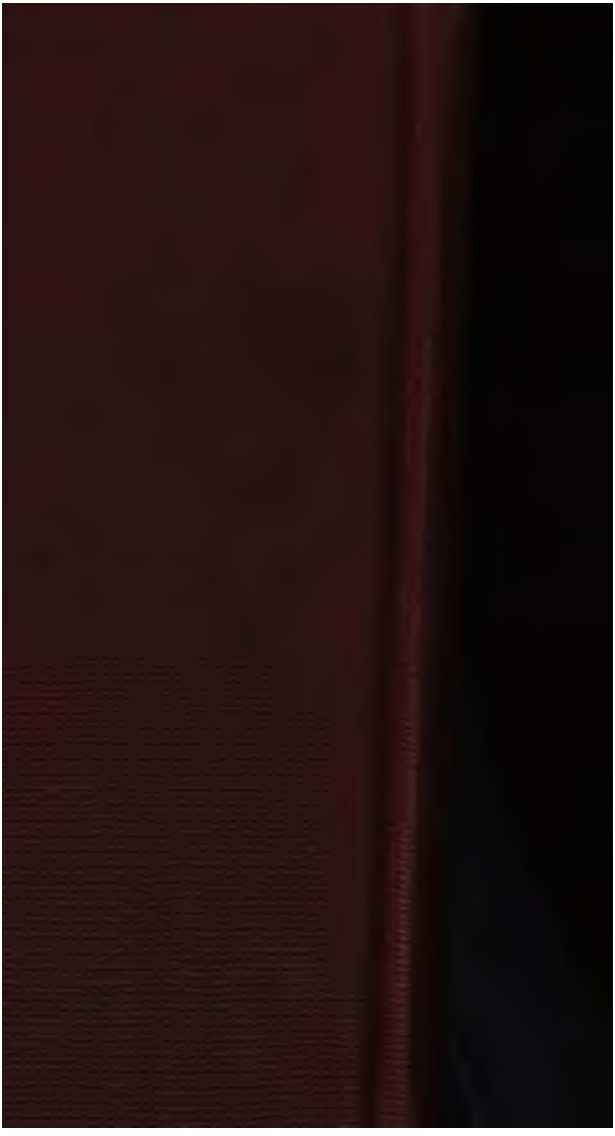
HERE

RESTS THE BODY

OF

LIEUT. GENERAL BUTZOU

Sobieski's soul was pierced. Incapable of speaking, he led his wife back to her carriage; and placing her in it, clasped her suddenly and fondly to his breast. His tears gushed out in spite of himself, and mingling with hers, poured those assurances of animated approbation through her heart, as made it even ache with excess of happiness.

Thus mutually endeared, we leave the family of Sir Robert Somerset. We leave Thaddeus Sobieski, blessed in the fruition of every earthly good. Whilst he, each morning, opens his eye to fresh prospects of joy, his pure and manly heart derives its best felicity from gratitude to heaven; and owns that the retrospection of past misfortunes, like shade to a picture, gives to our present bliss greater force and brightness.


SEP 16 1931